In the course of its study of the problem, the committee has become increasingly impressed by the need to revise the existing old-age insurance program in the direction of fitting the structure of benefits more closely to the basic needs of our people now and of benefits more closely to the basic needs of our people, now and in the future. With limited funds available for this type of insurance protection individual savings and other resources must insurance protection individual savings and other resources must continue to be the chief reliance for security. As a means of affording basic protection, however, the existing system can be much improved. With the advantage of more than 3 years of study and experience since the passage of the act, and with a greatly enhanced public understanding of the method of social insurance, the time seems ripe for the revision of the program to afford more adequate protection to more of our people. Under to afford more adequate protection to more of our people. the present old-age insurance system monthly benefits would not begin until 1942; for a considerable number of years thereafter benefits would remain small and would in many cases have to be supplemented by old-age assistance. Such assistance, based on individual need, is also necessary for those already old, and will continue to be necessary for groups outside the insurance system. For insured groups, however, it is both desirable and possible to provide immediately more adequate protection within the frame-provide immediately more adequate protection within the framework of the contributory system.

Old-age insurance is designed to prevent future old-age dependency; old-age assistance is designed to relieve existing needs. A contributory system of old-age insurance keeps the cost of old-age assistance from becoming excessive and assures support for the aged as an earned right. If the contributory system is strength-ened and liberalized, the cost of old-age assistance for uncovered groups will not increase so rapidly in future years when the proportion of aged in the population will be much higher than at present. present.

It is essential then that the contributory basis of our old-age insurance system be strengthened and not weakened. Contributory insurance is the best-known method of preventing dependency in old age by enabling wage earners to provide during their working years for their support after their retirement. By relating benefits to contributions or earnings, contributory old-age insurance preserves individual thrift and incentive; by granting benefits as a matter of right it preserves individual dignity. Contributory insurance therefore strengthens democratic principles and avoids paternalistic methods of providing old-age security. Moreover, a contributory basis facilitates the financing of a social-insurance scheme and is a safeguard against excessive liberalization of benefits as well as a protection against reduction of benefits.

tion of benefits as well as a protection against reduction of benefits.

The contributory method in social insurance is no innovation.

It had its beginning several hundred years ago in several countries It had its beginning several hundred years ago in several countries when small groups of workmen banded together in mutual-benefit societies to build up group protection against unforeseen contingencies. These early friendly societies developed the insurance method of protection which, by a gradual process of evolution, led to modern social insurance with the government entering to strengthen cooperative thrift and mutual protection. The contributory method of social insurance has stood the test of time and experience. Proof of this is the fact that no country which has once adopted a system of contributory social insurance has ever once adopted a system of contributory social insurance has ever abandoned it. Many foreign countries, as does the United States, supplement their contributory scheme with a noncontributory pension scheme based on individual need, but no country has ever given up the former system in favor of the latter.

Under the present old-age insurance system only taxes have been payable since 1937, while monthly benefits are not payable until January 1, 1942. So long as only taxes are payable and monthly benefits are postponed, the general public is under a misapprehension as to the financial operations of the plan and lacks a concrete demonstration of the effectiveness of the plan in providing protection. The recommendations of this committee with respect to the plan are insurance plan it is benefit will help to improve the underold-age insurance plan, it is hoped, will help to improve the under-standing of the aims of a contributory social-insurance plan. Providing more effective benefits: The basic problem confronting the committee was how to provide more adequate and effective benefits, particularly in the early years of operation, without in-creasing the future cost of the old-age insurance system. The committee has solved this problem in two principal ways, as follows:

1. Monthly benefits to wives, children, widows, orphans, and surviving dependent parents are substituted for the present 3½-percent lump sums payable to the estates of deceased workers.

2. The benefits of both single and married persons retiring in the early years are increased but the benefits of single persons with high earnings retiring years hence are reduced somewhat. However, the benefits proposed for single persons are higher than could be purchased with the employee's own contributions, except possibly in a very few extreme cases.

In other words, the effect of these changes will be to provide for larger benefits in the early years than under the present law and larger than could be purchased by an insured worker from a private insurance company with the amount he has paid the Government. This is particularly true in the case of married persons. However, this does not mean that unmarried persons who will contribute for many years will receive less protection from the Government than they could purchase from a private insurance company with their own contributions. It does mean, however, that a larger proportion of the employer's contributions are used to pay benefits to those retiring in the early years, particularly married persons. persons.

persons. Thus, various changes made by the committee are designed to afford more adequate protection to the family as a unit. The present law provides for only two general types of benefits, (1) monthly old-age benefits to qualified individuals and (2) lump-sum payments to nonqualified individuals and upon death. The present law is, therefore, limited in its scope in that it does not provide current monthly benefits to the surviving wife of an aged annuitant, nor to the surviving widow with dependent children. The payment of these survivorship benefits and supplements for the wife of an annuitant are more in keeping with the principle of social insurance than the $3\frac{1}{2}$ -percent lump-sum payments now provided. Under a social-insurance plan the primary purpose is to pay benefits in accordance with the probable needs of the beneficiaries rather than to make payments to the estate of a deficiaries rather than to make payments to the estate of a de-ceased person regardless of whether or not he leaves dependents.

There is ample precedent for such provision, since 15 out of 22 old-age insurance systems of foreign countries make provision for survivor benefits.

Cost of more adequate benefits: The net effect of the changes is that the annual cost of the benefits payable in the early years will be greater, the annual cost of the benefits payable in the later years will be less, and the average annual cost over the next 40 years, as testified to by the Chairman of the Social Security Board, will be about the same as under the present system. A more detailed explanation of the cost figures will be found on pages 15-17

Before beginning a more detailed explanation of the revised benefit provisions, the following summary presents a brief outline of the new benefit plan:

SUMMARY OUTLINE OF BENEFIT PROVISIONS UNDER THE REVISED FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVOR INSURANCE PLAN

EFFECTIVE DATE-JANUARY 1, 1940

OLD-AGE RETIREMENT BENEFITS

1. Old-age benefit: Each fully insured individual who has reached the age of 65 is eligible to receive a monthly primary (old age) insurance benefit determined as follows:

(a) A basic amount computed by applying 40 percent of average monthly wages, up to the first $50, plus 10 percent of average monthly wages in excess of $50.

(b) Such amount to be increased 1 percent for each year of coverage ($200 or more wages).2. Supplement for wife: In addition, the wife, age 65 and over, of an individual entitled to primary insurance benefits, if she is living with such individual, is eligible for a supplement which, when added to her primary insurance benefit, if any, equals one-half of a primary old-age insurance benefit of her husband.

3. Supplement for children: In addition each unmarried dependent child, under age 18, of an individual entitled to primary insurance benefits, is eligible for a supplement of one-half of a primary insurance benefit of the parent.

SURVIVOR BENEFITS

Widows' old-age insurance benefits: A widow of a fully insured individual, who has attained age 65 and who was living with such individual when he died, is eligible for a monthly benefit which when added to her primary insurance benefit, if any, is equal to three-fourths of a primary insurance benefit of her husband.

2. Orphans' monthly insurance benefits: A fully or currently insurance benefits: A fully or currently insurance benefits.

2. Orphans' monthly insurance benefits: A fully or currently insured individual's unmarried dependent orphan under age 18 is eligible for an orphan's benefit equal to one-half of a primary insurance benefit of the parent.

3. Current monthly insurance benefit to widow with children: A widow, regardless of age, of a fully or currently insured individual, who was living with such individual when he died, and has in her care one or more children entitled to child's benefits receives a monthly benefit which, when added to her primary insurance benefit, if any, is equal to three-fourths of his primary insurance benefit.

4. Parents' insurance benefits: A parent of a fully insured individual who dies leaving no widow and no unmarried child under age 18, if such parent has attained age 65, has not married since the fully insured individual's death, and was wholly dependent upon such individual at the time of such death, is eligible for a monthly benefit which, when added to the parent's other monthly benefits, if any, is equal to one-half of the primary insurance benefit of such fully insured individual fully insured individual.

fully insured individual.

5. Lump-sum death payment: Upon the death of a fully or currently insured individual, leaving no one immediately entitled to a monthly benefit, a lump sum equal to six times the monthly primary insurance benefit is payable to a surviving close relative, or if no close relative, the person assuming responsibility for the funeral expenses of the deceased to the extent of his actual disbursements.

MINIMUM AND MAXIMUM BENEFITS

The minimum benefit payment shall be not less than $10 per month. The maximum benefit or benefits payable shall be not more than double the primary insurance benefit, 80 percent of average wages, or $85, whichever is the smallest.

EFFECTIVE DATE

The first major change proposed is to advance the date for beginning the payment of monthly old-age insurance benefits from January 1, 1942, to January 1, 1940. From an administrative standpoint such an amendment is entirely practicable since the standpoint such an amendment is entirely practicable since the maintenance of wage records is already functioning successfully. Personnel has been trained and experience has been acquired in all phases of the program. Approximately 44,000,000 account numbers have been assigned, and the individual account for each worker set up by the Social Security Board. Furthermore, a network of over 300 field offices has been set up and is functioning. These offices have already handled over 360,000 claims for lumpsum benefits. The experience obtained in adjudicating these claims indicates that the necessary groundwork has been laid to permit the payment of monthly benefits in 1940 is in keeping with the experience under the social insurance laws of Great Britain, Czechoslovakia, and Germany where old-age insurance benefits were paid within 2 years after contributions first began. years after contributions first began.

LIBERALIZED AMOUNTS

The second major change proposed is the liberalization of bene-The second major change proposed is the liberalization of benefits to insured workers retiring in the early years of the system. This liberalization is effected by two important changes. First, the benefit base is changed from total accumulated wages to average wages; second, supplementary benefits are provided in those cases where the annuitant has an aged wife (as well as in the rare cases where there are dependent children). Under the present law the average monthly old-age insurance benefit payments in 1942 were originally estimated at about $17.50 per month. Under the revised plan the average for single individuals will be about $25.85 and for an eligible husband and wife about $38.78 per month. Table 2 shows illustrative monthly old-age insurance benefits under the present plan and under the revised plan.

REVISED BENEFIT FORMULA

An average wage formula will relate benefits more closely to an average wage formula will relate benefits more closely to normal wages during productive years. Since the object of social insurance is to compensate for wage loss, it is imperative that bene-fits be reasonably related to the wages of the individual. This insures that the cost of the benefits will stay within reasonable limits and that the system will be flexible enough to meet the wide variations in earnings which exist.

An average wage formula will also have the effect of raising the An average wage formula will also have the effect of raising the level of benefits payable in the early years of the system, but it will reduce future costs by eliminating unwarranted bonuses payable under the present formula to workers in insured employment only a few years. These bonuses result from the greater weight now given to the first $3,000 of accumulated wages. They are justified, if a total wage formula is used, in the case of older and low-paid workers who retire in the early years of the system and have not time in which to build up substantial benefit rights. In the long run, however such bonuses are unwise and endanger the solvency of the system by permitting disproportionately large benefits to workers who migrate between uninsured and insured employments and accumulate only small earnings in insured employment.

In order to relate benefits to length of employment as well as to average wages a 1-percent increment for each year of covered earnings of $200 or more is added to the basic benefit. Thus the longer ings of $200 or more is added to the basic benefit. Thus the longer a worker is in the system the larger will be his benefit. Supplementary benefits: The supplementary benefit payable an aged wife is one-half of the primary insurance benefit of the annuitant. (The same amount is payable for each dependent child.) Because most wives in the long run will build up wage credits on their own account as a result of their own employment these supplementary allowances will add but little to the ultimate cost of the system. They will on the other hand greatly increase the adequacy and equity of the system by recognizing that the probable need of a married couple is greater than that of a single individual. These changes in the benefit pattern are primarily designed to increase the adequacy of the system during the early years without altering the long-run cost proportions of the existing plan. They are not temporary improvements however but represent constructive changes which will increase the adequacy of the Federal old-tive changes which will increase the adequacy of the Federal oldage insurance system.

SURVIVOR BENEFITS

The bill contains a third major change, designed to improve the long-run effectiveness of our insurance system. This amendment proposes to establish monthly survivor benefits. The Social Security Act now provides a certain amount of survivor protection in the form of lump-sum payments. These are small and inadequate in the early years of the system and entirely unrelated to the needs of the recipients. However, eventually they will be rather costly and may not provide protection where most needed. The new plan will eliminate most lump-sum benefits and will substitute monthly benefits for those groups of survivors whose probable need is greatest. These groups are widows over 65, widows with children, orphans, and dependent parents over 65. The monthly benefits payable to these survivors are related in size to the deceased individual's past monthly benefit or the monthly benefit he would have received on attaining age 65.

In the case of a widow, the monthly benefit is three-fourths of the deceased's monthly benefit or prospective benefit. In the case of an orphan or dependent parent, it is one-half of the deceased's monthly benefit or prospective benefit.

A monthly benefit will be payable to a parent only if no widow or unmarried child under age 18 survived, and only if the parent was wholly dependent upon the deceased at time of death. While the processor for a parent opposite the processor for a parent opposite the processor for a parent of providence of the parent was wholly dependent upon the deceased at time of death. While was wholly dependent upon the decased at time of death. While it would thus be necessary for a parent to prove dependency at the time of death, once that fact had been established no subsequent showing of need would be required. Ample precedent for such provisions is found in the State workmen's compensation laws, which constitute the oldest form of social insurance in this country.

Illustrative benefits are shown in table 3. As has already been stated these new monthly benefits can be provided without recedent.

stated, these new monthly benefits can be provided without exceeding the eventual costs of the system as now set up, because of the reduction in lump-sum death benefits and the future benefits to single persons.

Not all lump-sum payments are eliminated under the new plan. Upon the death of an insured individual leaving no one immediately entitled to a monthly benefit, there will be paid a lump-sum benefit of six times the monthly benefit of the deceased. QUALIFYING PROVISIONS

The amendments provide a revision in the requirements con-cerning the length of time covered and amount of wages that must have been earned under the system in order to establish eligibility for benefits.

The revised requirements for benefits are similar in principle to those found in the present law, but are changed in several respects, due to the following reasons:

1. Since payment of benefits would be advanced to 1940, the number of qualifying years and the amount of wages are reduced number of qualifying years and the amount of wages are reduced in the early years.

2. Since wages after the age of 65 are not counted during 1937, 1938, and 1939, the qualification provisions are adjusted to permit such persons to qualify without undue hardship.

3. The present law permits persons who are in insured employment for only a short time to receive very large benefits in comparison to their contributions. In order to reduce the cost of paying benefits to these persons who shift between insured and uninsured employment, there have been added provisions to protect the system in future years.

the system in future years.

4. The addition of widows' and orphans' benefits necessitates a shorter qualifying period for current insurance protection in the case of persons who die without having been employed as long as is required to qualify for old-age insurance benefits.

"FULLY INSURED" AND "CURRENTLY INSURED"

Following is a synopsis of the definition of a "fully insured individual" and "currently insured individual" as contained in section 209 (g) and (h) of the bill:

A. An individual aged 65 or over on January 1, 1940, is fully insured for retirement benefits if he has 2 years of coverage and $600 total earnings before retirement (a year of coverage is a year in which $200 or more was paid for covered employment).

B. An individual who attains age 65 or dies in one of the years 1940 to 1945, inclusive, is fully insured with respect to all benefits if he has had at least the applicable coverage and earnings as

Date	Years of coverage	Total earn- ings
1940	3 3 4 4 5 5	$800 1,000 1,200 1,400 1,600 1,800

C. An individual who attains age 65 or dies in or after 1946 is fully insured with respect to all benefits if he has had not less than 1 year of coverage for each 2 years after 1936 (or the year of attaining age 21, if later), plus an additional year, and not less than $2,000 of total earnings, subject to a minimum of 5 years of coverage, and in any case if he has 15 years of coverage.

Currently insured individual: An individual who does not meet the above requirements is, however, currently insured (i. e., "widows' and orphans' current benefits" are payable) provided that he has had earnings of $50 or more in at least 6 of the 12 calendar cuarters immediately preceding the quarter in which he died quarters immediately preceding the quarter in which he died.

INDIVIDUAL EQUITY PRESERVED

The proposed revision, while maintaining a reasonable relationship between past earnings and future benefits, provides proportionately greater protection for the low-wage earner and the short-time wage earner than for those more favorably situated. But practically every worker, regardless of his level of wages or of the length of time during which he has contributed, would receive more by way of protection than he could have purchased from a private insurance company at a cost equal to his own contributions. In other words, the system recognizes the principle of individual equity, as well as the principle of social adequacy. It has been possible to incorporate in the system both these aspects of security by utilizing a larger proportion of employers' contributions to pay benefits to those retiring in the early years and to low-wage earners. This is similar to the procedure which is followed in private pension plans which recognize that the employer must contribute more liberally in behalf of older workers if they are to have sufficient income to retire.

Table 5 shows that under the tax and benefit plan as recommended every worker will receive more in protection for at least the next 40 years than he could purchase from a private insurance company with his own contributions. Even in an extreme case of a single person earning $250 per month for the next 45 years, the annuity purchasable elsewhere would amount to only 30 cents per month more than the $58 per month such person would be entitled to under the revised plan.

¹ These calculations are based upon the standard annuity table, at 3-percent interest. Taxes less 10-percent allowance for expenses are used for theoretic premiums. Part of the taxes are applied to the purchase of a death benefit which is identical with that of the suggested plan, and the remainder of the taxes are applied to the purchase of a deferred annuity with no death benefit.

The following assumptions have been made:
As regards taxes: A 1-percent tax rate on employer and also on employee through 1942; a 2-percent tax rate on each in 1943-45; a 2½-percent tax rate on each in 1946-48; and a 3-percent tax rate on each in 1949 and thereafter.

As regards benefits: Continuous years of coverage from age at entry to age 65, retirement at age 65; individual remains single for his entire lifetime and does not leave a widow, a child under 18, or a dependent parent.

FINANCING

FINANCING

Certain amendments are proposed which affect the financial framework of the old-age insurance system. First, the old-age reserve account is changed to a Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board, all ex officio, acting as a board of trustees. The board of trustees will supervise the fund and will report to Congress annually and whenever the trust fund becomes unduly small or exceeds three times the highest annual expenditure anticipated in the ensuing 5-fiscal-year period. The Secretary of the Treasury will serve as managing trustee of the fund. All assets credited to the reserve account as of January 1, 1940, are transferred to the trust fund when the reserve account is abolished on that date. It is further proposed that an amount equal to the full amount of the old-age insurance taxes collected in the future be permanently appropriated to the trust fund. Provision is made for the administrative costs of the plan to be met from the trust fund.

The method of investing that portion of the trust fund not needed for current claims or administrative purposes will be like that now provided in the case of the unemployment trust fund. Instead of a minimum 3-percent interest on the investments of the present old-age reserve account, the Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund, like the unemployment trust fund, vivor insurance trust fund, like the unemployment trust fund, will earn interest at the current average rate of interest borne by all outstanding interest-bearing obligations composing the public debt. At the present time the rate of interest being paid to the unemployment trust fund is 2½ percent.

The present tax schedule is amended so that the current rate of 1 percent on employers and 1 percent on employers is continued until 1943. This postponement in the tax step-up will save employers and workers about $275,000,000 for 1940 or a total of $825,000,000 for the 3 years 1940, 1941, and 1942. However, no 8825,000,000 for the 3 years 1940, 1941, and 1942. However, no change is made in the tax schedule thereafter. The rates will still increase to 2 percent in 1943, 2½ percent in 1946, and 3 percent in 1949 and thereafter.

The result of the committee's recommendations with respect to taxes and benefits on the size of the reserve and the amount of the benefit payments is shown in table 6. It should be noted that the maximum reserve built up in the period shown will be between seven and eight billion dollars. It should also be noted that the size of the reserve will conform closely to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury of an "eventual reserve amounting to not more than three times the highest prospective annual benefits in the ensuing 5 years."

It should be clearly understood that the estimates presented are subject to a margin of error. Changes in average wages, death rates, birth rates, the rate of retirement, the proportion of the aged in the total population, and shifts between insured and uninsured groups may result in substantial changes in these figures in the future. It is impossible, therefore, to predict accurately the feature transport of all the features to predict accurately the future trends of all the factors influencing the long-run aspects of the old-age insurance program. The further one projects estimates of future income and benefit payments, the greater is the margin of error. Constant study and frequent revaluations are, therefore, essential for the long-run financing of our social-insur-This is one of the reasons why the committee has ance system. This is one of the reasons why the commenced that the board of trustees make an annual report to Congress on the actuarial status of the system, and report to Congress whenever the trust fund is unduly small, or exceeds three times the highest annual expenditures expected in the next 5-fiscalyear period.

According to the best expert information available to the committee, the estimates presented here are reasonable approximations of the income and outgo of the insurance plan for the next 15 years. The actual figures will no doubt vary somewhat from those shown in table 6. However, the benefit payments shown, although based upon an intermediate estimate as regards rate of retirement, probably represent maximum amounts payable under the provisions of ably represent maximum amounts payable under the provisions of the bill. A serious downswing in business conditions might increase the rate of old-age retirement and decrease the estimated amount of tax receipts, but such variations would probably not alter the fact that the contributions and interest will cover all benefit payments for the next 10 to 15 years. It is only when consideration is given to the income and outgo of the system for 40 to 45 years, or even more, that it becomes quite impossible to predict the future status of the system.

Table 6 shows that the annual contributions from workers and

Table 6 shows that the annual contributions from workers and employers will probably be sufficient until 1955 to meet all the annual benefit payments under the revised plan. If the original actuarial assumptions of 1935 prove to be correct, it is possible that benefits for all time to come can be financed from the present schedule of taxes and the interest from the fund, even with the recommended postponement of the tax step-up until 1943. However, upon the basis of additional data developed since 1935, it would appear that the actuarial calculations of 1935 represent a minimum estimate of the future costs. Therefore it is possible that the annual cost of the benefits may begin to exceed the annual tax collections about 1955 or even somewhat sooner.

Only after experience has been obtained in paying benefits for several years will we have a better picture of the probable future development of the system. Even then continual change will be necessary in the estimates due to the many variable factors which go into making such estimates.

In making the changes in the present plan the committee has kept constantly in mind the fact that, while disbursements for benefits are relatively small in the early years of the program, far larger total disbursements are inevitable in the future.

The plan recommended by this committee is designed to safe-guard workers, employers, and the general public. In fact the committee believes the revised plan is a much safer one than the committee believes the revised plan is a much safer one than the present plan. As has already been pointed out, while the annual costs under the revised plan are greater in the early years of operation, the future annual costs of the benefits when the system reaches maturity are materially lower than under the present law and the over-all average cost is kept about the same. Consequently, it is believed that there is not the same danger as exists in the present benefit schedule, the cost of which, while deceptively small in the early years, mounts very steeply as the years progress.

Unforseen contingencies may, however, change the entire opera-tion of the plan. It is important, therefore, that Congress be kept fully informed of the probable future obligations being incurred under the insurance plan as well as the public-assistance plans.

Each generation may then meet the situation before it in such manner as it deems best.

If future annual pay-roll tax collections plus available interest are insufficient to meet future annual benefits it will be necessary, in order to pay the promised benefits, to increase the pay-roll tax in order to pay the promised benefits, to increase the pay-roll tax or provide for the deficiency out of other general taxes, or do both. Broadening the coverage of the system to bring in those persons now excluded will not only make the system more effective in providing protection but also strengthen its actuarial base by still further eliminating the possibility of unearned benefits to the worker who moves from uninsured to insured employment.

COVERAGE

Four years ago, when the old-age insurance program was being planned, it was expected that the act as passed would provide old-age security for about half of the gainful workers in the country. It was realized, of course, that many workers who might not be insured under the act at any one time would later obtain protection by shifting into insured occupations. It was generally supposed, however, that the group so shifting would be small compared with the great mass of workers, who, throughout their working life, would remain continuously either in the insured category. ing life, would remain continuously either in the insured category or in the uninsured category.

Operation of the act shows that the extent of migration, temporary or permanent, from uninsured to insured employment is far greater than was assumed by the President's Committee on Economic Security in 1935. As a consequence of the migration, a much larger proportion of the total population of the United States will qualify under the contributory system for old-age benefits then had been expected.

that had been expected.

The most important excluded groups are agricultural labor, domestic service, and certain nonprofit organizations; here the committee decided unanimously that it would be unwise to remove the exemptions from these three groups at the present time. The present bill does, however, extend old-age insurance coverage to present bill does, however, extend old-age insurance coverage to some 1,100,000 more workers by removing the exemption of maritime employment, wages earned after 65, and certain Federal instrumentalities such as national banks and State banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System.

In order to eliminate the nuisance of inconsequential tax payments the bill excludes certain services performed for fraternal benefit societies and other nonprofit institutions exempt from income tax, and certain other groups. While the earnings of a substantial number of persons are excluded by this recommendation, the total amount of earnings involved is undoubtedly very small. No estimate is available of the number of persons or amount of earnings so excluded. The intent of the amendment is to exclude those persons and those organizations in which the employment is part time or intermittent and the total amount of earnings is only nominal, and the payment of the tax is inconsequential and a nuisance. The benefit rights built up are also inconsequential. Many of those affected, such as students and the secretaries of nuisance. The benefit rights built up are also inconsequential. Many of those affected, such as students and the secretaries of lodges, will have other employment which will enable them to develop insurance benefits. This amendment, therefore, should simplify the administration for the worker, the employer, and the Government.

Seven other coverage amendments are proposed. They are as follows:

 1. Agricultural labor: The present act excludes "agricultural labor" from coverage. The bill continues the exemption of agricultural labor and defines the term so as to clarify its meaning and to extend the meaning to certain services which are an integral part of farming activities. These provisions are explained in detail in a subsequent part of this report, in connection with the definition of "agricultural labor" as defined in section 209 (1) of the
- 2. Exclusion of payments to employer welfare plans: The term "wages" is amended so as to exclude from tax payments made by an employer on account of a retirement, sickness, or accident-disabilplan, or for medical and hospitalization expenses in connection with sickness or accident disability. Dismissal wages which the employer is not legally required to make, and payments by an employer of the worker's Federal insurance contributions or a contribution required of the worker under a State unemployment-compensation law are also excluded from tax. This will save employers pensation haw are also excluded from tax. This will save employers time and money, but what is more important is that it will eliminate any reluctance on the part of the employer to establish such plans due to the additional tax cost.

 3. Definition of "employee": The bill includes a definition of the - term "employee" designed to cover salesmen not already covered by the act.
- 4. State employment: The exemption relating to employment by State instrumentalities is so defined as to apply only to an instrumentality wholly owned by the State or political subdivision, or tax exempt under the Constitution.
- 5. Foreign governments: Provision is made for the exemption of foreign governments, and their instrumentalities under certain conditions, from the old-age insurance taxes.

 6. Family employment: Service performed by an individual for his son, daughter, wife, or husband, and service by a child under 21 for his parent, is excluded so as to make the old-age insurance coverage identical in this respect with unemployment compensation coverage.

 7. Included and excluded services: The law is changed with re-

6. Subchapter A, chapter 9, of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly title VIII of the Social Security Act) is given the short title "Federal Insurance Contributions Act."

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The unemployment compensation and public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act constitute the most comprehensive attempt yet made to utilize a system of Federal-State cooperation for the solution of national problems. To promote State operation for the solution of national problems. To promote State action in unemployment compensation, the Federal law establishes a uniform tax payable by employers regardless of whether the State in which they operate has an unemployment-compensation law; it then permits employers to offset (up to 90 percent of their Federal tax) contributions paid by them under a State unemployment-compensation law. The act also provides that the Federal Government shall make grants to the States to cover the entire necessary cost of proper administration of their unemployment-compensation laws.

The recommendations of the committee valotive to unemployment.

The recommendations of the committee relative to unemployment compensation deal with certain changes which in no way alter the fundamental Federal-State pattern now set forth in the Federal law. Under the present law the States are given very wide latitude in determining the way in which the State unemploymentcompensation laws should operate. The Federal law merely prescribes a few simple standards. The States determine all such questions as the type of fund, the coverage of the law, the eligibility provisions, the waiting period, the amount and duration of benefits, the type of administrative agency. They also select the personnel and determine the compensation and tenure of such research. personnel.

Though the adjustment of Federal-State relations is at best a difficult and delicate task, particularly in the field of social legislation, experience so far in unemployment compensation indicates a large measure of success. The present provisions of the Federal law have proved completely effective in facilitating the enactment of State unemployment compensation laws. These laws and the character of their administration have, on the whole, been reasonably satisfactory. The inevitable administrative difficulties involved in the inauguration of any large-scale undertaking were accentuated by the fact that in 22 jurisdictions unemployment compensation first became payable in January 1938, at a time of unexpectedly heavy unemployment. It is, therefore, not surprising that a considerable backlog of undisposed claims accumulated during the early months of benefit payments. In spite of these difficulties, the 31 jurisdictions that had begun paying benefits by the end of 1938 had paid out about $400,000,000 in benefits to approximately 3,500,000 unemployed workers.

approximately 3,500,000 unemployed workers.

The most pressing problem in unemployment compensation during 1938 was the improvement and simplification of the State laws. Some 30 States have already passed extensive amendments at this year's legislative sessions and about 13 other States are still considering substantial changes—all designed to simplify and improve administration for the benefit of the employer, the worker, and the Government. Further encouragement is given by the fact that the latest figures for 1939 show that practically all States are now currently disposing of all claims received and have eliminated their backlog of undisposed claims accumulated during 1938.

Although all the States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, and Hawaii are receiving Federal grants for the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws, and although benefits are now being paid in 46 States (in addition to Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia), the unemployment-compensation program is still in its infancy. Only 22 States, in addition to the District of Columbia, have had benefit-paying experience for more than 1 complete year. In one State benefits have been payable since July 1936, and 21 others, in addition to the District of Columbia, began benefit payments in January 1938. Six more States and the Territories of Alaska and Hawaii came in some time during 1938, so that a total of 31 jurisdictions were paying benefits by the end of 1938; another 16 joined the benefit-paying group in January 1939. Not until July of 31 Juliantenins were paying group in January 1939. Not until July of this year, when the last two States come in, will the Federal-State unemployment-compensation program be fully functioning. It is estimated that at the end of 1938 approximately 27,600,000 workers had earned wage credits in some prior period of employment covered by State laws, and that at that time 668,000 employers were subject to State laws. More than 38,000,000 benefit checks were issued during the year 1938, the average weekly check for total unemployment being approximately $11. Data on the operation of the States paying benefits in 1938 are shown in table 7. Up to the end of April 1939 nearly $540,000,000 had been paid out in unemployment-compensation benefits by the 46 States, the District of Columbia, and the 2 Territories which had started to pay benefits before that date. (See table 8.) During the month of March 1939 alone almost $49,000,000 was paid out in benefits to more than 1,000,000 workers.

As of April 30, 1939, a total of $1,270,370,000 was available for benefits in all the States (see table 9). This sum represents the total of moneys deposited in the unemployment trust fund, held by the States pending deposit, and withdrawn by the States pending benefit payment. Of this amount, $1,118,120,000 was available for benefits in those jurisdictions actually paying benefits. The reserves at this time would be about $225,000,000 less if all States had started the payment of benefits in January 1938. Since over half the States did not begin payment until later, their reserves were built up at a faster rate than originally anticipated. This is evident from the fact that in the States which did pay benefits in 1938, about 82 cents were paid out in benefits for each dollar collected in contributions for the same year. Benefit payments would have been increased further, and the available reserves reduced to the same extent, if the system had been in operation for several years, so that workers could have built up larger wage records.

As of end of December 1937. Benefits first payable July 1936.

However, while the reserve funds of most States are in a stronger position at the present time than when benefit payments were first begun, this is not true for all States. There were 13 States in which benefit payments during 1938 were equal to or in excess of the amounts collected in contributions from the date benefits were first payable. The one State the benefits and out the date benefits were first amounts collected in contributions from the date benefits were first payable. In one State the benefits paid out were nearly three times the contributions collected during the period benefits were paid. The year 1938 was a year of substantial unemployment, and most States are now rebuilding their reserve funds for future benefit payments. Yet the uneven character of unemployment is shown by the fact that three States paid out benefits during the first 3 months of 1939 in excess of the contributions collected, Economic resources and unemployment are not of equal magnitude in all the States. Different problems and varying standards

Economic resources and unemployment are not of equal magnitude in all the States. Different problems and varying standards are, therefore, to be expected in the various State unemployment compensation systems. While benefit standards in all States are still not fully adequate to meet the problem of unemployment, those in some States are more inadequate than in others. At the same time, some States have accumulated considerable reserves, and there is demand from these States for a reduction in the unemployment-compensation contributions. Caution must be exercised, however, in attempting to remedy these inadequacies and inequalities before sufficient experience is acquired. The Federal-State program of unemployment compensation is the only existing permanent Federal program aimed at meeting part of the unempermanent. permanent Federal program aimed at meeting part of the unemployment problem. Consequently it must not be viewed as temporary legislation. Proposed changes in the unemployment-compensation program must be tested in terms of both present need and future justification.

In considering the provisions and the experience of the State laws, the committee's objective was to make such changes as will best help to relieve industry of any unnecessary burdens and to provide help to relieve industry of any unnecessary burdens and to provide the unemployed with more adequate benefits. Moreover, the committee earnestly sought to keep any suggested changes within the framework of the present Federal-State system. This the committee has done by developing a plan, after very careful study, whereby the present taxes for unemployment compensation may be reduced in those States which can afford to maintain a certain benefit standard. No drastic change in the basic pattern of the State laws is required, and each State may decide for itself whether it will take advantage of the plan.

STATE-WIDE REDUCTION PLAN

In accordance with this plan, the present bill proposes to amend the Federal tax provisions so that States which have built up a certain reserve and meet minimum benefit standards may reduce their present rate of contributions on a uniform basis. All States now have a basic contribution rate of 2.7 percent or higher.

A sufficient reserve, as a condition for the allowance of reductions in State contribution rates, is defined in the proposed amendment as not less than one and a half times the highest amount paid into the State unemployment-compensation fund with respect to any one of the 10 preceding years, or not less than early and paid into the State themployment-compensation fund with respect to any one of the 10 preceding years, or not less than one and a half times the highest amount of compensation paid out of the State fund within any one of the 10 preceding years, whichever amount is the greater.

The minimum benefit standards which the State must meet if it desires to reduce its general contribution rate below 2.7 percent are as follows:

1. At least 16 weeks of benefits within a period of 52 consecutive weeks or one-third the individual's earnings, whichever is less.

2. A waiting period of not more than 2 weeks in any 52 consecutive weeks.

3. Weekly benefit rates averaging at least 50 percent of full-time weekly earnings with a $5 minimum benefit and a maximum benefit of at least $15.

4. Partial benefits for individuals whose weekly earnings fall below their benefits for total unemployment.

The amendment for the proposed horizontal reduction plan would go into effect immediately. State legislatures now in session which will adjourn before final adoption of this bill might anticipate its enactment and pass the necessary legislation to enable the Governor or the State unemployment-compensation agency to take advantage of the plan. In other States special sessions would have to be called if immediate advantage is to be taken of the reduction in the taxes. While the reduction in the sessions would have to be called it immediate advantage is to be taken of the reduction in the taxes. While the reduction in the tax rate cannot go into effect in the State until the minimum benefit standards are also provided, the State may compute the reserve necessary to meet the requirements as of any time within 27 weeks before the reduced rates and the minimum benefit standards are made effective. This gives all States a retroactive period of slightly over 6 months in which to select a date for computation of the necessary reserve. It should be noted that a State may select such a computation date prior to the effective. State may select such a computation date prior to the effective date of this bill.

It is estimated that this proposed amendment may save employers between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000 during the calendar year 1940. The exact amount will depend upon how many States take advantage of the plan, the dates upon which the reductions take place, and the amount of the new contribution rates.

All except about five States will probably have sufficient re-serves so as to take advantage of the horizontal reduction plan serves so as to take advantage of the horizontal reduction plan sometime during 1940. Depending upon the effective date of this bill, it may be possible that some States will wish to take advantage of the proposed plan and provide for the reduction of contributions late this year. This might result in a tax reduction of as much as an additional $100,000,000 in 1939.

OTHER UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION CHANGES

Under the proposed State-wide reduction plan, described above, employers would still be allowed to obtain their full 90-percent credit against the Federal pay-roll tax. The Federal tax would remain at 3 percent, but additional credits would be provided for all employers in States which were in a position to reduce their contribution rates below 2.7 percent.

This State-wide reduction plan would not alter present individual experience-rating provisions. The States which could make general tax reductions after building up the necessary reserve fund and raising their minimum benefit standards, might still allow further raising their minimum benefit standards, might still allow further contribution reductions to individual employers with favorable employment experience. States which did not meet the new minimum benefit standards or whose reserve fund was inadequate, could continue under their present laws, with or without individual employer experience rating systems, provided they maintained contribution rates, producing a total amount equal to 2.7 percent of the taxable pay rolls. The bill provides that the provisions with respect to maintenance of the average 2.7 percent will not go into effect until January 1, 1942, with respect to a pooled fund or to a partially pooled account or to a separate reserve account. Those States which do not wish to take advantage of the horizontal reduction plan but wish to maintain the individual employer experience-rating system would do so without having to make any legisence-rating system would do so without having to make any legislative changes at this time.

Further saving to employers would be effected by the proposed amendment granting relief to employers who paid their State unamendment granting reflet to employers who paid their state un-employment-compensation contributions for the years 1936, 1937, and 1938 too late to qualify for the Federal credit. Employers who pay their delinquent taxes for these years before the sixtieth day after the enactment of these amendments would receive full credit against their Federal taxes for 1936, 1937, and 1938. This would amount to an aggregate sum of about $15,000,000. Further the probe relaxed by (1) increasing from 60 to 90 days the maximum period for which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is permitted to grant an extension for the filing of Federal tax returns, and (2) by providing that employers who pay their taxes after January 31 but before July 1 next following the close of the taxable year would lose only 10 percent of their allowable credit.

Another of the amendments would result in a saving to employers as well as in considerable simplification of reporting procedures. This is the amendment to limit unemployment-compensation taxes to the first $3,000 of annual wages. Such a limitation already exists in the case of old-age insurance and there are distinct advantages to providing a uniform tax base for both programs. It is estimated that this new limitation would result in a saving to employers of about $65,000,000 a year.

Again in the interests of simplification and uniform reporting, the present bill proposes to change the tax base for unemploy-ment compensation from "wages payable" to the "wages paid" definition used in old-age insurance.

Many of the same changes in coverage are provided in this bill with respect to unemployment compensation as have already been discussed under old-age insurance. The cases involving taxes of small consequence, which would be exempt under old-age insurance, would also be exempt from the Federal Unemployment Tax Act. The agricultural labor exemption is defined and extended as in old-age insurance. The bill proposes to extend coverage to one of the groups now excluded, namely, employees of certain Federal instrumentalities such, as national banks and State bank members of the Federal Reserve System. This amendment would bring about 200,000 additional persons under the unemployment-compensation program, provided the States amend their laws accordingly. their laws accordingly.

Provision is made in section 902 (h) of the bill granting relief to taxpayers and States in those cases in which the highest court of a State has held contributions paid under the State unemployment-compensation law for 1936 or 1937 not to have been validly required under such law. This provision is to take care of the situation in North Carolina where the State supreme court recently held that the provisions of the State law requiring contributions for 1936 were invalid because they were retroactive. The effect of the proposed amendment is to enable North Carolina to keep about $3,000,000 in its reserve fund for use in the payment of intemployment compensation benefits the payment of unemployment-compensation benefits

Other changes affecting unemployment compensation are:
1. Authorization is given to the States to make their unemployment-compensation laws applicable to services performed on land or premises owned, held, or possessed by the United States Government, such as services performed as employees of hotels in national parks. Congress has already enacted a statute giving the States authority to apply their workmen's compensation laws the States authority to apply their workmen's compensation laws to such employees.

2. The language excluding State instrumentalities is defined as in old-age insurance so that the exemption applies only to an instrumentality wholly owned by the State or political subdivision, as well as those exempt from tax under the Constitution.

3. As in old-age insurance, the definition of "wages" is amended so as to exclude from tax the payments made by an employer on account of a retirement, sickness, or accident-disability plan, or for medical or hospitalization expense in connection with sickness or accident disability. Dismissal wages, which the employer is not legally required to pay, and payments by an employer of the worker's Federal insurance contributions, or a contribution required of the worker under a State unemployment-compensation required of the worker under a State unemployment-compensation law are also excluded from tax.

4. Provision is made, as in old-age insurance, for the exemption of foreign governments and their instrumentalities from the unof foreign governments and their instrumentatities from the unemployment-compensation tax.

5. The law is changed with respect to services of an employee performing both included and excluded employment for the same employer so that the services which predominate in a pay period determine his status with that employer for the period. The same provision is made in connection with old-age insurance.

6. The "merit rating" or "individual employer experience rating" provisions are clarified.

7. A provision has been inserted requiring the State laws to provide for the expenditure of Federal grants for the administration of vide for the expenditure of Federal grants for the administration of their unemployment-compensation laws in accordance with the Federal act and requiring the replacement of any moneys lost or expended for other purposes.

8. Extension of time is given for the allowance of credit against the Federal tax in cases where the employer has paid his State tax on time but has paid it to the wrong State.

9. The time is also extended in those cases where taxpayer's assets are in the custody or control of a receiver, trustee, or other fiduciary under the control of a court.

under the control of a court.

10. The "tax on employers of eight or more" now contained in subchapter C of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly title IX of the Social Security Act) is given the short title "Federal Unemployment Tax Act."

PUBLIC ASSISTANCE

The committee has included in the bill several amendments designed to liberalize and clarify existing Federal provisions concerning public assistance and to simplify the administration of the State plans. No fundamental change in Federal-State relations is proposed.

Increase in grants for old-age assistance: Under the present law the Federal Government reimburses the States for 50 percent of their assistance payments to the needy aged up to a maximum of $30 a month for each person aided. This means that the Federal Government does not pay more than $15 toward the assistance provided any ment does not pay more than $15 toward the assistance provided any aged person in any month. The bill increases the $30 limit to $40 so that the maximum Federal grant per aged person is increased from $15 to $20 per month. This amendment will allow the States to liberalize their grants to needy aged persons if they so desire. It is estimated that the cost of this change to the Federal Government will be about $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 per year, depending upon the extent to which the States take advantage of the new proposal. Liberalization of aid to dependent children: At the present time the Federal Government contributes only one-third of the payments made by the States to dependent children as against one-half in the case of the aged and the blind. As a result, there are still eight case of the aged and the blind. As a result, there are still eight States in addition to Alaska which are not participating in this program, and in many of the States that are participating the level of assistance for dependent children is lower than that for the aged and assistance for dependent children is lower than that for the aged and the blind. The eight States are Connecticut, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Mississippi, Nevada, South Dakota, and Texas. The average amount of aid per dependent child is about $13.50 per month compared with $19.50 for old-age assistance and $23.25 for blind persons. The rapid expansion of the program for aid to dependent children in the country as a whole since 1935 stands in marked contrast to the relatively stable picture of mothers' aid in the preceding 4-year period from 1932 through 1935. The extension of the program during the last 3 years is due to Federal contributions which encouraged the matching of State and local funds.

Furthermore, many States have liberalized their laws by adopting a broader definition of the term "dependent child," by liberalizing the amounts that may be granted to needed cases, and by relaxing requirements relating to residence. At the close of 1935, aid was received by 117,000 families in behalf of 286,000 children. In May 1939 payment for aid to dependent children was being made to about 695,000 children in 287,000 families under plans made to about 695,000 children in 287,000 families under plans approved by the Social Security Board. During the calendar year 1938 nearly $95,000,000 was spent by the Federal, State, and local governments for aid to dependent children under plans approved by the Board. The number of old people now being aided through Federal grants is nearly three times as large as the number of dependent children being aided. But the actual number of dependent children in need of assistance is probably fully as large as the number of needy aged now receiving assistance.

The bill makes two changes, effective January 1, 1940, designed as large as the number of needy aged now receiving assistance.

The bill makes two changes, effective January 1, 1940, designed to expand aid to dependent children. They are as follows:

1. The Federal matching is increased from one-third to one-half. This will enable the States to give aid to many additional needy children. There are at the present time about 165,000 children in 71,000 families who have filed applications in the States for aid and many more who will be eligible for aid when these additional funds become available.

these additional funds become available.

2. The age limit for Federal grants is raised from 16 to 18 if the State agency finds that the child is regularly attending school. This will enable most children to finish high school. Six States already provide aid to children up to the age of 18, and 6 additional States have the necessary legislation to take advantage of this amendment immediately. It is estimated that about 100,000 additional children may obtain aid by virtue of this change, provided all States amend their laws accordingly.

It is estimated that the present State programs, when amended

It is estimated that the present State programs, when amended in accordance with the provisions of this bill will enable the States to provide monthly benefits for at least 1,000,000 dependent children or over 300,000 more children than are being aided at the present time.

The additional cost to the Federal Government of these two amendments is difficult to estimate due to the fact that the amendments are effective only at such time and to the extent that the States match the Federal funds. The additional costs of these amendments for assistance to children is estimated at about $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 per year. Some of this cost will be offset in future years because of the widows' and orphans' benefits provided under the insurance plan. In any case, our obligation to provide care for the children of today who will be the parents of the next generation is one which must be met. The amendments recommended to both the insurance and the assistance titles are part of a common program to promote the security of the are part of a common program to promote the security of the family and the home.

Administrative amendments: The bill alters the method by which Administrative amendments: The bill alters the method by which the Federal Government shall settle with the States whose laws provide for a recovery from recipients or the estates of recipients of old-age assistance. At present these States must actually draw a check to reimburse the Federal Government for its share of any amount so recovered. The new plan provides adjustment in the amount of the Federal grant on account of the Federal pro rata share of any amount so recovered by the State. Any amount which the State spends on funeral expenses (in the case of aged or blind recipients) is considered in making the adjustment. The new plan of Federal-State settlement is applicable in all three assistance programs, whereas existing law affects only old-age assistance. The purpose of all three assistance programs is further clarified

The purpose of all three assistance programs is further clarified by inserting the word "needy" in the definitions of those who may receive old-age assistance, aid to the blind, or aid to dependent children. A closely related clarifying amendment is applied to all three assistance titles and provides that the States, in determining need, must consider any other income and resources of individuals claiming assistance.

The only other important amendment affecting the public-assist-The only other important amendment affecting the public-assistance titles is one which requires that the States, in order to receive Federal grants, must provide safeguards to restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of the plan. All three assistance titles would be thus amended, the obvious purpose being to insure efficient administration and to protect recipients from humiliation and exploitation.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

The basic act providing for the vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise was passed by the Congress in 1920. The purpose of this act is to assist physically disabled persons, through guidance, medical and surgical treatment, artificial appliances, retraining, placement, and other essential services in entering or returning to suitable employment in order that they may support themselves and their dependents.

For carrying out its purposes the basic Vocational Rehabilitation Act authorized the appropriation of $1,000,000 annually to be allotted to the States on the basis of their population with the stipulation that, to receive its allotment, a State must accept the provisions of the Federal act and match its expenditures from Federal funds dollar for dollar with State funds.

The basic act was not a permanent and continuing one but was extended from time to time by the Congress until 1935, when the vocational-rehabilitation program was incorporated as a part of the social-security program. Under the Social Security Act the Vocational Rehabilitation Act was made permanent, and the authorization for appropriations was increased to $1,938,000 annually, which, when matched by State funds, makes available for rehabili-which, when matched by State runds, makes available for rehabilitation purposes approximately $4,000,000 annually.

Few people are aware of the size of the problem of the physically disabled and its social and economic significance. Recent surveys by the United States Public Health Service and by a number of by the United States Public Health Service and by a number of State rehabilitation departments show that at any one time at least 30 persons in each 1,000 of the general population are physically disabled. On this basis there are in this country nearly 4,000,000 physically disabled persons.

Each year in the United States at least 800,000 persons become physically disabled through industrial, home, automobile, and other accidents, and diseases, such as arthritis, tuberculosis, and heart trouble. The experiences of the State rehabilitation departments show that not all of these persons are disabled to the extent that they are unable after convalescence to enter or return to employment. About 67 percent are able to make their own employements. ment. About 67 percent are able to make their own employent adjustment. The remaining 33 percent require rehabilitation service to aid them to engage in remunerative employment.

Disabled persons who require assistance in their employment adjustment fall into three major groups:

1. Those who through training and other rehabilitation services can be returned to regular lines of competitive employment. This group comprises 60,000 persons annually.

2. Those whose disabilities are so serious that they cannot be restored to competitive employment but can be trained in small business enterprises or in sheltered workshops. This group numbers about 150,000.

business enterprises or in sneitered worksnops. This group numbers about 150,000.

3. Those who are so disabled that, if they are to be employed at all, they must be provided with suitable work in their homes. This group includes approximately 50,000 persons annually.

The first group (60,000) described above constitute the most pressing problem. Practically all of this group could and should be rehabilitated to complete self-support.

Experience of the States shows that it costs an average of $300 per case to rehabilitate a disabled person. On this basis the present program, with maximum efficiency in the expenditure of funds, cannot be expected to rehabilitate more than 12,500 persons per year. Thus each year 47,500 of those who could and should be made self-supporting cannot be rehabilitated because of lack of sufficient self-supporting cannot be rehabilitated because of lack of sufficient funds.

The cost of maintaining a dependent person in idleness averages about $500 per year. The maintenance of 47,500 disabled persons (of the 60,000 who could and should be rehabilitated to complete self-support in competitive employment) is now costing someone—relatives, communities, or the State and Federal Governments—$23,750,000 per year. The expenditure by the Federal and State Governments of $300 each for their rehabilitation would not only obviate the enormous annual cost of maintaining these persons in idleness, but would on the basis of 20 years' experience in rehabilitating the disabled, increase the economic income to the Nation by some $47,500,000 per year.

bilitating the disabled, increase the economic income to the Nation by some $47,500,000 per year.

Obviously it would not be wise to appropriate at once funds sufficient to meet the whole vocational rehabilitation problem. It would appear, however, that a substantial increase over the present amount could be efficiently absorbed and would be a wise investment of public funds. The machinery for rehabilitating the disabled is already in existence. Hence, any additional funds provided could be used entirely for services to those who at present cannot be served.

The committee has recommended, therefore, an increase of itation. The $1,000,000 in the authorization for vocational rehabilitation. The various States are now raising nearly $600,000 per year in excess of the amount matched by the Federal Government. Consequently, the additional authorization will permit the matching of these amounts and allow for additional funds to be matched by the States so that the total amounts available for rehabilitation purposes will be about $6,000,000 per year. Table 10 shows the allotment of Federal funds under the present act and under the committee's recommendation.

GENERAL

Two amendments of a general character have been recommended by the committee. These are:

1. An amendment to prohibit the disclosure of information obtained by the Board or its employees except under certain restricted conditions related to proper administration.

2. Penalties are provided for certain frauds and for impersonation in securing information concerning an individual's date of birth, employment, wages, or benefits of any individual.

DETAILED EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

SHORT TITLE

Section 1 of the bill provides that the act may be cited as the "Social Security Act Amendments of 1939."

TITLE I-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE I OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT CHANGES IN REQUIREMENTS FOR THE STATE OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE PLANS

Section 101: This section amends section 2 (a) of the Social Section 101: This section amends section 2 (a) of the Social Security Act. Section 2 (a) sets out in clauses (1) through (7) certain basic requirements which a State old-age assistance plan must meet in order to be approved by the Social Security Board. Clauses (5) and (7) are amended and a new clause, numbered (8), is added.

The amendment to clause (5) merely makes it clear that the methods of administration of the State plan must be proper as well as efficient.

The present subject matter of clause (7) is stricken from section 2 (a) by the amendment and is treated in section 102 of the bill. The amended clause (7) is effective July 1, 1941. Under this clause the State plan must provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance. This will make it clear that regardless of its nature or source any income make it clear that, regardless of its nature or source, any income make it clear that, regardless of its nature of source, any income or resources will have to be considered, including ordinary income from business or private sources, Federal benefit insurance payments under title II of the Social Security Act, and any other assets or means of support. The committee recommends this change to provide greater assurance that the limited amounts available for old-age assistance in the States will be distributed only among those actually in need and on as equitable a basis as possible.

The new clause, numbered (8), also effective July 1, 1941, requires that the State plan must provide safeguards which restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of old-age assistance.

PAYMENT TO STATES FOR OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

Section 102: This section amends section 3 of the Social Security Act.

Subsection (a) of section 3 is amended so that its provisions will conform with section 1 of the Social Security Act which authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish financial assistance to needy aged individuals and increases the amount up to which the Federal Government will contribute one-half from $30 to $40.

Subsection (b) is amended so as to provide that the Board in making grants to States shall reduce the amount to be paid to any State for any quarter by a sum equivalent to the pro rata share to which the United States is equitably entitled as determined by the Board of the net amount recovered during any prior quarter by the State or any political subdivision thereof with respect to old-age assistance furnished under the State plan.

The provision will include all recoveries made with respect to old-age assistance furnished under the State plan such as for example recoveries from the estates of recipients, payments under mistake, etc.

A proviso eliminates for the purpose of determining the amount of the offset, any amount recovered from the estate of a deceased recipient, not in excess of the amount expended by the State for the funeral expenses of such deceased recipient in accordance with the State public-assistance law upon which the State plan is based. Section 103: This section amends section 6 so as to conform its provisions with section 1 of the act, which authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish financial assistance to aged needy individuals.

TITLE II-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE II OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVOR INSURANCE BENEFITS

This title amends title II of the Social Security Act. It revises and extends the present provisions for old-age insurance benefits. It includes benefits for qualified wives and children of individuals entitled to old-age insurance benefits and for qualified widows, children, and parents of deceased individuals who, regardless of age at death, have fulfilled certain conditions. It also provides a lump-sum payment on death where no monthly benefits are then payable. The amendment also advances the date for initial monthly benefit payments from 1942 to 1940. A Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund is established under the amendment, and provision is made for a board of three trustees to manage the trust fund. A number of administrative changes are made, and there is provision for judicial review of decisions of the Social Security Board with respect to benefit rights. A detailed explanation of title II as amended follows.

FEDERAL OLD-AGE AND SURVIVOR INSURANCE TRUST FUND

Section 201: This section creates a Federal old-age and survivor Section 201: This section creates a Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund in place of the present old-age reserve account, which is abolished by these amendments. The trust fund is to be held by a board of trustees composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board, all ex officio. Amounts equivalent to 100 percent of the taxes received under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act (formerly title VIII of the Social Security Act) are permanently appropriated to the trust fund, and old-age and survivor insurance benefits will be paid out of the fund. These amendments will clarify the relationship between contributions under the social-security program in the form of taxes and the source of benefit payments. source of benefit payments.

Section 201 (a) creates the trust fund and provides that the fund shall consist of (1) the securities held by the Secretary of the Treasury for the present old-age reserve account, (2) the amount standing to the credit of such account on January 1, 1940, and (3) amounts equivalent to 100 percent of the taxes received under the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, which are permanently appropriated to the trust fund.

Section 201 (b) creates a board of trustees of the Federal old-age Section 201 (b) creates a board of trustees of the Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board, all ex officio. The Secretary of the Treasury is designated as the managing trustee. The board of trustees created by these amendments is similar to the set-up in the Postal Savings Act. The board of trustees, in addition to reporting annually to Congress on the status and operations of the trust fund, will be required to report immediately to Congress whenever the board is of the opinion that during the ensuing 5 fiscal years the trust fund will exceed three times the highest annual expenditures anticipated during that 5-fiscal-year period and whenever it is of the opinion that the amount of the trust fund is unduly small.

Section 201 (c) directs the managing trustee of the trust fund to invest the surplus of the trust fund in interest-bearing obligations of the United States or in obligations guaranteed as to both principal and interest by the United States. Special obligations bearing interest at a rate equal to the average rate of interest on the public debt, computed as of the end of the calendar month next preceding the date when the special obligations are issued, may be issued to the trust fund. However, the bill contains a provision that such special obligations shall be issued only if the managing trustee determines that the purchase of obligations in which the trust fund is permitted to invest on original issue or at the market price is not in the public interest.

Section 201 (d) authorizes the managing trustee to sell regular obligations acquired by the trust fund at the market price and to redeem the special obligations at par plus accrued interest.

Section 201 (e) provides that the interest on and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of obligations held in the trust fund shall be credited to and form a part of the trust fund.

Section 201 (f) sets up a procedure whereby the trust fund will Section 201 (f) sets up a procedure whereby the trust fund will be required to pay the cost of administration by the Social Security Board and the Treasury of the old-age and survivor insurance system. Monthly, the managing trustee will pay from the trust fund into the general fund of the Treasury the amount which he and the Chairman of the Social Security Board estimate will be expended during the month for the administration of the system.

Section 201 (g) provides that the trust fund shall be available for making benefit payments required under title II of the Social Security Act.

Security Act.

OLD-AGE AND SURVIVOR INSURANCE BENEFIT PAYMENTS Primary insurance benefits

Section 202 (a): This subsection provides, for aged individuals, monthly "primary insurance benefits" (computed under sec. 209 (e)), which are based on an individual's "average monthly wage" (see sec. 209 (f)). These benefits are payable to an individual for each month until his death, upon condition that he (1) is at least 65 years of age, (2) is a fully insured individual (defined in sec. 209 (g)), and (3) has applied for them. Primary insurance benefits are payable beginning with the first month in which the individual becomes eligible for them, having met conditions (1), (2), and (3) above. All of such conditions may be met in a single month, or part in one month and part in another month or months.

The first month for which a primary insurance benefit or any other benefit can be paid under section 202, is January 1940. All benefits under section 202 are payable as nearly as possible in equal monthly installments, but a benefit for a particular month is not necessarily payable within that month.

Wife's insurance benefits

Section 202 (b): This subsection provides for monthly "wife's insurance benefits" for an aged wife (defined in sec. 209 (i)) whose husband is living and is entitled to "primary insurance benefits" under subsection (a). The purpose of these wife's benefits, which are based on the wages of the husband, is to assure the wife of a monthly amount equal to one-half of the amount which her husband, and the subsection of the section of the secti monthly amount equal to one-half of the amount which her hus-band receives as a monthly primary insurance benefit. A benefit is payable to the wife for each month, upon condition that she (1) is at least 65 years of age, (2) has applied for the benefits, (3) was living with her husband at the time of filing such applica-tion, and (4) is not herself entitled to a monthly primary insur-ance benefit which is equal to or greater than one-half of a monthly primary insurance benefit for a month is equal to pre-half of the monthly primary insurance benefit of the husband.

Benefit period: Wife's insurance benefits are payable beginning with the first month in which the wife becomes eligible for them, having met conditions (1), (2), (3), and (4) above. All of such conditions may be met in a single month, or part in one month and part in another month or months. The benefits end when the wife dies, her husband dies, they are divorced, or she becomes entitled to a monthly primary insurance benefit under subsection (a) equal to or exceeding one-half of her husband's monthly primary insurance benefit. mary insurance benefit.

Child's insurance benefits

Section 202 (c): Paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection provide for monthly "child's insurance benefits" for a child (defined in sec. 209 (k)) whose parent is entitled to primary insurance benefits or whose deceased parent (regardless of his age at death) was a fully or currently insured individual (as defined in sec. 209 (g) and (h)). The purpose of these child's benefits is to assure the child (h)). The purpose of these child's benefits is to assure the child of a monthly amount based on the wages of the parent or deceased parent. A benefit is payable to a child for each month, upon condition that the child (1) has filed application for the benefits (or application has been filed for him), (2) was unmarried and had not attained age 18 at the time his application was filed, and (3) was "dependent upon" the parent at the time the application was filed, or, if the parent has died, was "dependent upon" him at the time of death

Benefit rate: A child's insurance benefit for a month is equal to one-half of the monthly primary insurance benefit of the parent or deceased parent with respect to whose wages the child is entitled to receive the benefit. In the case of the deceased parent, such primary insurance benefit is the amount which such parent would have been entitled to receive if he had, before his death, met the conditions for payment of a primary insurance benefit under subsection (a). If there is more than one such parent or deceased parent, the child is entitled to one-half of the primary insurance benefit which

Benefit period: Child's insurance benefits are payable beginning with the first month in which the child becomes eligible for them, having met conditions (1), (2), and (3) above. All of such conditions may be met in a single month, or part in one month and part in another month or months. The child's benefits end when he dies, marries, is adopted, or attains age 18.

"Dependent upon" defined: Paragraphs (3) and (4) of section 202 (c) define the term "dependent upon," as used in paragraph (1).

As a child is normally dependent upon his father or adopting father, paragraph (3) provides that he shall be deemed so dependent unless, at the time the child's application for benefits is filed, or if such father or adopting father is dead, at the time of death, such inditather or adopting father is dead, at the time of death, such individual was not living with the child or contributing to his support and (A) the child is neither the legitimate nor adopted child of such individual, or (B) the child had been adopted by some other individual, or (C) the child, at the time of such individual's death, was living with and supported by the child's stepfather.

As a child is not usually financially dependent upon his mother, adopting mother, or stepparent, paragraph (4) provides that, for the purposes of paragraph (1), a child shall not be deemed dependent upon any such individual unless, at the time the child's application for benefits is filed, or, if such individual is dead, at the time of death, no parent other than such mother, adopting mother, or stepparent was contributing to the support of the child and the child was not living with his father or adopting father.

Widow's insurance benefits

Widow's insurance benefits

Section 202 (d): This subsection provides for monthly "widow's insurance benefits" for an aged widow (defined in sec. 209 (j)) whose husband died a fully insured individual (defined in sec. 209 (g)). The purpose of these widow's benefits, which are based on the wages of the deceased husband, is to assure the widow of the wages of the deceased husband, is to assure the widow of a monthly amount equal to three-fourths of the amount to which her husband was entitled, or would have been entitled if he had, before his death, met the conditions for a primary insurance benefit under subsection (a). A benefit is payable to the widow for each month, upon condition that she (1) is at least 65 years of age, (2) has not remarried, (3) has filed application for the benefits, (4) was living with her husband at the time of his death, and (5) is not herself entitled to a monthly primary insurance benefit which is equal to or greater than three-fourths of the monthly primary insurance benefit of her husband.

with the month in which the widow becomes eligible for them, having met conditions (1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) above. Benefits end when the widow remarries, dies, or becomes entitled to a monthly pri-mary insurance benefit equal to or exceeding three-fourths of the monthly primary insurance benefit of her husband.

Widow's current insurance benefits

Section 202 (e): This subsection provides for "widow's current insurance benefits," which are based on the wages of a husband who died a fully or currently insured individual (as defined in sec. 209 (g) and (h)). The purpose of this subsection is to extend financial protection to the widow regardless af her age, while she has in her care a child of the deceased husband entitled to child's insurance benefits. It provides assurance for such a widow, before she becomes 65 years of age, of a monthly amount equal to three-fourths of the amount to which her husband would have been entitled if, before his death, he had met the conditions for a princery insurance benefit under subsection (a). When also herefit under subsection (b) when the property insurance benefit under subsection (c). mary insurance benefit under subsection (a). A benefit is payable to the widow for each month, upon condition that she (1) has not remarried, (2) is not entitled to receive a monthly widow's insurance benefit under subsection (d) or a monthly primary insurance benefit which is equal to or greater than three-fourths of a monthly primary insurance benefit of her husband, (3) was living with her husband at the time of his death, (4) has filed application for the benefits, and (5) at the time of filing such application has in her care a child of the deceased husband entitled to receive child's insurance benefits. By "in her care" is meant that she takes responsibility for the welfare and care of the child, whether or not she actually lives in the same home with the child at the time she files application. time she files application.

Section 202 (f): This subsection provides for "parent's insurance benefits" for an aged parent whose son or daughter died a fully insured individual (as defined in sec. 209 (g)), leaving no widow and no unmarried surviving child under age 18. The purpose of these benefits, which are based on the wages of the son or daughter, is to extend financial protection to the aged parent where the parent was wholly dependent upon and supported by the son or daughter at the time such son or daughter died, and where no such widow or child survives. It assures the parent, in such cases of a monthly amount, equal to one-half of the amount such cases, of a monthly amount equal to one-half of the amount to which the son or daughter was or would have been entitled as a fully insured individual if such son or daughter before death, as a fully insured individual if such son or daughter before death, had met the conditions for a primary insurance benefit under subsection (a). A benefit may be payable to both a mother and a father of the same fully insured individual. A benefit is payable to the parent for each month, upon condition that such parent (1) has attained age 65, (2) was wholly dependent upon and supported by the son or daughter at the time of the son's or daughter's death and filed proof of such dependency and support within 2 years of the date of such death, (3) has not married since such death, (4) is not entitled to receive any other monthly insurance benefits of any kind or is entitled to receive one or more of such monthly benefits, the total of which is less than one-half of the monthly primary insurance benefit of the deceased son or daughter, and (5) has filed application for parent's insurance benefits.

If the parent is or becomes entitled to a monthly benefit or benefits (other than parent's insurance benefits) and such monthly benefit or the total of such monthly benefits is less than one-half of the monthly primary insurance benefit of the son or daughter, then the parent's benefit for the month in which the parent becomes entitled to such other benefit or benefits and the parent becomes entitled to such other benefit or benefits, and for each month thereafter, is equal to the difference between such other monthly benefit or the total of such other monthly benefits and one-half of the son's or daughter's monthly primary insurance benefit.

Benefit period: Parent's insurance benefits are payable beginning with the month in which the parent becomes eligible for them, having met conditions (1), (2), (3), (4), and (5) above. All of such conditions may be met in a single month, or part in one month and part in another month or months. Benefits end when the parent dies, marries, or becomes entitled to receive for any month an insurance benefit or benefits (other than parent's insurance benefits) in a total amount equal to or exceeding one-half of a primary insurance benefit of the deceased son or daughter.

"Parent" defined: Paragraph (3) of section 202 (f) defines the term "parent" to mean the mother or father of an individual, the stepparent of an individual by a marriage contracted before such individual attained age 16, and the adopting parent by whom such individual was adopted before he attained age 16.

Lump-sum death payments

Section 202 (g): This section provides for the payment of a lump sum to a person hereinafter described, upon the death, after December 31, 1939, of a fully or currently insured individual (as defined in sec. 209 (g) and (h)) who left no surviving widow, child, or parent who would, on filing application in the month in which such fully or currently insured individual died, be entitled to a benefit for such month under subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this section.

Description of persons who may be entitled: The lump-sum payments are made to the following persons under the conditions stated: (1) To the widow or widower of the deceased; (2) if no such widow or widower is living at the time of the fully or currently insured individual's death, to any child or children of the deceased and to any other person or persons who are, under the intestacy law of the State where the deceased was domiciled, entitled to share law of the State where the deceased vas domiciled, entitled to share as distributees with such children of the deceased, in such proportions as provided by such law; (3) if no widow or widower and no such child and no such other person is living at the time of such death, to the parent or parents of the deceased, and to any other person or persons who are entitled under the law of the State where deceased was domiciled to share as distributees with the parents of the deceased, in such proportions as provided by such law. The Board is to determine the relationship under (1), (2), and (3) above, and if there is more than one person entitled hereunder, is to distribute the lump-sum payment among all who are entitled. If none of the persons described under (1), (2), and (3) is living at the time of the Board's determination, the amount due is to be paid to any person or persons equitably entitled thereto, to the extent and in the proportions that he or they shall have paid the expenses of burial of the deceased (but no such payment for burial expenses may exceed the amount actually disbursed by the person or persons who paid such expenses). Amount of payment: The lump-sum payment is an amount equal to six times a primary insurance benefit for a month (as defined in sec. 209 (e)) of the fully or currently insured deceased individual.

Application for lump-sum payment: The lump sum is payable only if application is filed by or on behalf of the person entitled (whether or not legally competent) prior to the expiration of 2 years after the date of death of the fully or currently insured

Delayed applications

Delayed applications

Section 202 (h): This subsection provides that an individual who would have been entitled to an insurance benefit under subsection (b), (c), (d), (e), or (f) of this section for any month, if he had filed his application for such benefit during such month, shall be entitled to such benefit for such month if he files application for it before the end of the third month immediately succeeding such month. The purpose of this section is to prevent the loss of benefits to individuals who might not know of their right to benefits or who, for some other reason, have delayed filing their applications. If, for example, in March a widow has fulfilled all eligibility conditions under section 202 (d) except the filing of her application, and files application in June, she will be entitled to a benefit for March, April, May, June, and thereafter, as if she had filed her application in March. Similarly, if she files application in July, she will be entitled to a benefit for April, May, June, July, and thereafter, just as if she had filed her application in April.

REDUCTION AND INCREASE OF INSURANCE BENEFITS

REDUCTION AND INCREASE OF INSURANCE BENEFITS

Section 203: This section provides a maximum and minimum for benefits payable under section 202, and for reduction or increase to such maximum or minimum, as the case may be, of the monthly amount of the benefit which would be payable except for this section. It provides also for deductions from benefits because of gainful employment for a stated amount of wages, and under certain other enumerated circumstances, and for deductions for hymn summary payable provides to 100 times. deductions for lump-sum payments made prior to 1940 upon attainment of age 65.

Maximum benefits

Section 203 (a): This subsection provides that any benefits payable on the basis of an individual's wages shall be reduced, so that able on the basis of an individual's wages shall be reduced, so that the maximum for any benefit (if only one benefit for a month is payable with respect to the wages of an individual) or for the total of all benefits (if more than one benefit is payable for a month with respect to the wages of an individual) shall not exceed $85, or two times the primary insurance benefit of such individual, or 80 percent of the average monthly wage of such individual, whichever is least. This takes the place of the provision now in the Social Security Act limiting the monthly rate of benefits to $85.

Minimum benefits

Section 203 (b): This subsection provides that benefits payable on the basis of an individual's wages shall be increased so that the minimum for any benefit or for the total of benefits (where more than one benefit is payable for a month) is $10. This provision also prevents a reduction under subsection (a) to below $10 in the case where the average monthly wage is very low.

Proportionate reduction or increase

Section 203 (c): This subsection provides that whenever a reduction or increase is required by subsection (a) or (b) and more than one benefit is payable for the month with respect to the wages of an individual, each of the benefits shall be proportionately increased or decreased, as the case may be.

Deductions because of employment, etc.

Section 203 (d): This subsection provides that deductions shall be made from any benefits to which an individual is entitled, until such deductions total the amount of the benefit or of the benefits (where the individual is entitled to receive more than one insurance benefit) which such individual was entitled to receive for any month in which he (1) rendered services for wages of not less than $15; or (2) if a child over 16 and under 18 years of age failed to attend school regularly and the Board finds that such attend-ance was feasible; or (3) if a widow entitled to a widow's current insurance benefit did not have in her care a child of her deceased insurance benefit did not have in her care a child of her deceased husband entitled to receive a child's insurance benefit.

Section 203 (e): This subsection provides that deductions shall be made from any wife's or child's insurance benefit until the total equals the wife's or child's benefit or benefits for any month in which the individual, with respect to whose wages such benefit was payable, rendered services for wages of not less than $15. For example, if a child receives a benefit of $10 per month because of a father who is receiving a $20 per month primary insurance benefit, $10 is deducted from benefits payable to the child if the father works in a month for wages of $15 or more.

Duplication of deductions prevented

Section 203 (f): This subsection prevents the duplication of deductions under subsections (d) and (e). If, for example, a deduction is imposed because of the occurrence in a month of an event enumerated in subsection (d), there is no deduction because of employment in that month as set forth in subsection (e).

Report to Board of employment

Section 203 (g): This subsection requires that the occurrence of any of the events enumerated in subsection (d) or (e) be reported to the Board by any individual whose benefits are subject to a deduction under those subsections. If the individual had knowledge of the occurrence of the event, failure to so report is penalized by doubling the deduction.

Deductions because of lump-sum payments

Section 203 (h): An individual entitled to a benefit under these amendments may have been paid a lump sum upon attainment of age 65, under provisions of the Social Security Act in force prior to 1940. This subsection provides that deductions shall also be made from any primary insurance benefit to which an individual is entitled, or from any other insurance benefit payable with respect to the wages of such individual, until such deductions total the amount of any such lump-sum payment to such individual. Deductions under subsections (d), (e), and (h) are made after any reductions or increases which may be required under subsections (a) and (b), and such deductions may be made in such month or months, and at such rate, as the Board may determine. Section 203 (h): An individual entitled to a benefit under these

OVERPAYMENTS AND UNDERPAYMENTS Adjustment of erroneous payments

Section 204 (a): This subsection provides that errors in payments to an individual shall be adjusted by increasing or decreasments to an individual shall be adjusted by increasing or decreasing subsequent benefits to which such individual is entitled. If such individual dies before adjustment has been begun or completed, adjustment shall be made by increasing or decreasing subsequent benefits payable with respect to the wages which were the basis of benefits of such deceased individual. Thus, if error is made in the payment of a primary insurance benefit to an individual, adjustment shall be made upon his death in favor of or against his widow, children, and parents, if any, who are entitled to receive benefits. If error is made in the payment of any benefit other than a primary insurance benefit, then upon the death of the individual receiving such benefit, adjustment shall be made in favor of or against the primary beneficiary on the basis of whose wages such erroneous payments were made, and in favor of or against any other beneficiary whose benefits are payable on the basis of those wages.

Section 204 (b) waives any right of the United States to recover by legal action or otherwise in any case of incorrect payment to an individual who is without fault if adjustment or recovery would defeat the purpose of this title or would be against equity and good conscience. Section 204 (c) protects from liability any certifying or disbursing officer in any case where adjustment or recovery is waived under subsection (b), or where adjustment under subsection (a) is not completed prior to the death of all persons against whose benefits deductions are authorized.

EVIDENCE, PROCEDURE, AND CERTIFICATION FOR PAYMENT

Administrative and judicial review provisions not now provided in the Social Security Act are included, and administrative provisions are included which are similar to those under which the Veterans' Administration operates.

proofs to establish rights to benefits.

Section 205 (b) outlines the general functions of the Board in determining rights to benefits. It requires the Board to offer opportunity for a hearing, upon request, to an individual whose rights are prejudiced by any decision of the Board. The Board is also authorized, on its own motion, to hold such hearings and to conduct such investigations and other proceedings as it may deem necessary or proper, and may administer oaths and affirma-tions and examine witnesses. Evidence may be received at any hearing before the Board even though inadmissible under rules of evidence applicable to court procedure.

Section 205 (c) provides a procedure for the establishment, maintenance, and correction of wage records. Clause (1) directs the Board to maintain the records, and upon request to inform any wage earner, or after the wage earner's death, his wife, child, or parent, of the amount of his wages and periods of payments, shown by such records at the time of such request. The records are declared to constitute evidence of the amount of wages and the periods of payment, and the absence of an entry for any period constitutes evidence that no wages were paid in such period.

Clause (2) provides that, after the expiration of the fourth calendar year following any year in which wages were paid or alleged to have been paid, the Board's records shall be conclusive of the amount of wages and periods of payment except as provided in Clause (3) authorizes the Board to correct its records prior to the expiration of such fourth year. Written notice of any revision which is adverse to the interests of any individual shall be given to such individual in any case where he has been previously notified by the Board of the amount of wages and the periods of payment shown by the records. Upon request prior to the expiration of such fourth year or within 60 days thereafter, the Board shall afford any wage earner, or after his death, his wife, child, or parent, a hearing with respect to any alleged error in its records.

Clause (4) provides for a limited correction of the records after Clause (4) provides for a limited correction of the records after the expiration of the fourth year. The procedure is the same as that provided in clause (3), but no change can be made under this clause except to conform the records with tax returns and other data submitted under title VIII of the Social Security Act or sub-chapter A of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code, and regula-tions thereunder.

Clause (5) provides for judicial review of decisions under this subsection in the same manner as is provided in subsection (g).

The present provisions of the Social Security Act do not specify what remedy, if any, is open to a claimant in the event his claim to benefits is denied by the Board. The provisions of this subsection are similar to those made for the review of decisions of many administrative bodies. The Board's decisions on questions of law will be reviewable, but its findings of fact, if supported by substantial evidence, will be conclusive. Where a decision of the Board is based on a failure to submit proof in conformity with a regulation, the court may review only the question of conformity of the proof with the regulation and the validity of the regulation. Section 205 (i) incorporates substantially the provisions of the present section 207 of the act with respect to certification by the Board of the individuals entitled to payments, except that certification is made to, and payment is made by, the managing trustee. Section 205 (k) provides that any payments hereafter made under conditions set forth in subsection (j), any payments made before January 1, 1940, to, or on behalf of, legally incompetent individuals, and any payments made after December 31, 1939, to a legally incompetent individual without knowledge by the Board of such incompetency prior to certification of payment, if otherwise such incompetency prior to certification of payment, if otherwise valid under this title, shall be a complete settlement and satis-

Section 205 (1) authorizes the Board to delegate the powers conferred upon it by this section. This includes the power to issue subpenas, conduct hearings, make determinations of the right to benefits, and make certification of payments. It also authorizes the Board to appear by its own attorneys in court proceedings under subsection (e) for the enforcement of Board subpenas.

Section 205 (m) provides that applications for benefits filed prior to 3 months before the applicant becomes entitled to receive benefits, shall be invalid.

Section 205 (n) authorizes the Board to certify to the managing trustee any two or more individuals in the same family for joint payment of the total benefits payable to such individuals.

REPRESENTATION OF CLAIMANTS BEFORE THE BOARD

Section 206: This section authorizes the Board to prescribe regulations concerning the practice of attorneys, agents, and other persons in the preparation or presentation of claims for benefits before the Board, and the Board may require of such agents or other persons (other than attorneys) as a condition to recognition that they show that they are of good character and good repute and are competent to represent claimants. An attorney in good standing who is admitted to practice before the highest court of a State, Territory, or District, or before the Supreme Court of the United States, or an inferior Federal court, is entitled to represent claimants before the Board. Under certain conditions an individual may be suspended or prohibited from further practice before the Board. While it is not contemplated that the services of an agent or attorney will be necessary in presenting the vast majority of claims, the experience of other agencies would indicate that where such services are performed the fees charged therefor should be subject to regulation by the Board, and it is so provided. The provision is similar to the statute (5 U. S. C., sec. 261), giving the Treasury Department comparable authority. For the purpose of protecting claimants and beneficiaries a penalty is provided for violation of Board regulations prescribing fees and for deceiving, misleading, or threatening claimants or beneficiaries with intent to defraud.

Section 208: This section is designed to protect the system against fraud. The present penal provisions are broadened and clarified so as to specifically apply to the making of false statements such as in tax returns, tax claims, etc., for the purpose of obtaining or increasing benefits, and to apply to the making of false statements, affidavits, or documents in connection with an application for benefits, regardless of whether made by the application of the process. plicant or some other person.

DEFINITIONS

Definition of wages

Section 209 (a): This subsection continues the present definition of wages, but excludes certain payments heretofore included. Paragraph (2) excludes all payments made by the employer to or on behalf of an employee, or former employee, under a plan or system providing for retirement benefits (including pensions), or disability benefits (including medical and hospitalization expenses), disability benefits (including medical and hospitalization expenses), but not life insurance. These payments would be excluded even though the amount or possibility of such payments is taken into consideration in fixing the amount of remuneration and even though such payments are required, either expressly or impliedly, by the contract of employment. Since it is the practice of some employers to provide for such payments through insurance or the establishment and maintenance of funds for the purpose, the premiums or insurance payments and the payments made into or out of any fund would likewise be excluded from wages. Paragraph (3) expressly excludes from wages, payment by an employer (without deduction from the remuneration of, or other reimbursement from the employee) of the employee's tax imposed by section (without deduction from the remuneration of, or other reimburses-ment from, the employee) of the employee's tax imposed by section 1400 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 801 of the Social Security Act) and employee contributions under State unemploy-ment compensation laws. Paragraph (4) excludes dismissal pay-ments which the employer is not legally obligated to make. The exclusion of remuneration paid prior to January 1, 1937, is merely a technical change. Such remuneration has never been any basis for the benefits under this title, being excluded in the provi-sions providing the benefits. Such provisions are simplified by sions providing the benefits. Such provisions are simplified by transferring the exclusion to the definition of wages.

Definition of employment

Section 209 (b): This term is defined to mean any service per-Section 209 (b): This term is defined to mean any service performed prior to January 1, 1940, which would be included under existing law for purposes of credit toward benefits; and to mean any service performed after December 31, 1939, by an employee for the person employing him, irrespective of the citizenship or residence of either, (A) within the United States, or (B) on or in connection with an American vessel (defined in subsec. (d)) under a contract of service entered into within the United States or during the performance of which the vessel touches a port therein, if the employee is employed on, and in connection with, the vessel when outside the United States. No substantive change in existing law employee is employed on and in connection with, the vessel when outside the United States. No substantive change in existing law is made by the introductory paragraph of this provision except the extension of the definition to include service on American vessels. This extension is designed to include, with the qualifications noted, all service which is attached to, or connected with, the noted, all service which is attached to, or connected with, the vessel (e.g., service by officers and members of the crew and other employees such as those of concessionaires). Individuals who are passengers on the vessel in the generally accepted sense, such as an employee of an American department store going abroad, would not be included, because their service has no connection with the vessel. Service performed on, or in connection with, an American vessel within the United States will be on the same basis as regards inclusion as other services performed within the United States.

States.

Under existing law service performed within the United States (which otherwise constitutes employment) is covered irrespective of the citizenship or residence of the employer or employee. The amendment makes clear that this will be true also in the case of maritime service covered by the amendment, regardless of whether performed within or without the United States. The basic reasons which caused the original coverage to be made without distinctions account of stitutes the residence are researched. tions on account of citizenship or residence apply in the case of seamen. The number of foreign seamen who may be employed on American vessels engaged in trade is limited under our shipping

The definition of the term "employment" under the amendment, as applied to service rendered prior to January 1, 1940, retains the exemptions contained in the present law. The definition applicable to service rendered on and after that date continues unchanged some of the present exemptions, revises others, and adds certain additional ones.

Paragraph (1) continues the exception of agricultural labor, but a new subsection (1) defines the term for purposes of the exclusion.

Paragraph (2) continues the present exception of domestic service in a private home, but adds to the exception such service in a local college club or local chapter of a college fraternity or sorority (not including alumni clubs or chapters). Thus services of cook, waiter, chambermaid, and the house mother, performed for these local clubs and chapters, are exempt.

Paragraph (3) continues the present exception of casual labor not in the course of the employer's trade or business.

A new paragraph (4) excludes service performed by an individual in the employ of his son, daughter, or spouse, and service performed by a child under the age of 21 in the employ of his parent. This exclusion is already contained in the Federal unemployment tax provisions of the existing law and is considered advisable because of the possibility offered by such employment for collusion in building up credits in certain cases which offer a high return for a small amount of contributions.

Paragraph (5), which takes the place of the existing exclusion of service on documented vessels, excludes service performed on or in connection with a vessel not an American vessel, if the employee is employed on and in connection with such vessel when cutside the United States. This provision excludes all service, although performed within the United States, which is rendered by an employee who was rendering service on and in connection with such a vessel upon its entry into the United States or who is rendering such service upon departure of the vessel from the United States. Thus, officers and members of the crew and other employees whose service is rendered both on and in connection employees whose service is rendered both on and in connection with the vessel (such as employees of concessionaires and others whose service is similarly connected with the vessel) when on its voyage are excluded even though the vessel is within the United States, if they come into or go out of the United States with the vessel.

Paragraph (6) continues the exemption of service performed in the employ of the United States but, with respect to instrumentalities of the United States, limits the exemption to those instrumentalities which are (A) wholly owned by the United States or (B) exempt from the tax imposed by section 1410 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 804 of the Social Security Act) by virtue of any other provision of law. The change in this provision brings within this title of the act certain Federal instrumentalities not falling within clause (A) or (B) above, such as national banks.

Paragraph (7) continues the exemption of service for State governments, their subdivisions and instrumentalities, but limits the exemption with respect to instrumentalities so that it applies only to an instrumentality which is wholly cwned by a State or political subdivision or which would be immune from the tax imposed by section 1410 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 804 of the Social Security Act) by the Constitution. The amendment thus narrows the present exemption and in no case broadens it.

Paragraph (8) continues the exemption of religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational organizations, but brings the language of the exemption into conformity with the corresponding exemption from income tax under section 101 (6) of the Internal Revenue Code, by adding a specific disqualifying clause applicable where any substantial part of the activities of the organization is carrying on propaganda or otherwise attempting to influence legislation.

Paragraph (9) continues without change the present provisions

Paragraph (9) continues without change the present provisions of law exempting services of employees covered by the railroad-retirement system. This provision leaves unchanged the exempretirement system. This provision leaves unchanged the exemption of the service of an individual in the employ of an employer subject to the railroad retirement system even though the individual receives remuneration in a form, e. g., tips, not recognized as compensation under the Railroad Retirement Act and subchapter B of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly the Carriers' Taxing Act of 1937), and leaves unchanged the inclusion of service in case it is performed by an employee in the segregable nonrailroad activities of an employer where segregation of the railroad activities from nonrailroad activities is found tion of the railroad activities from nonrailroad activities is found necessary in the interpretation and administration of the laws relating to the social-security system and the railroad-retirement

Paragraph (10) provides several new exclusions from employ-ent. Clause (A) exempts certain service in any calendar quarment. Clause (A) exempts certain service in any calendar quarter performed in the employ of an organization exempt from income tax under section 101 of the Internal Revenue Code, if (i) the remuneration for such service does not exceed $45; or (ii) without regard to amount of remuneration, if the service is performed in connection with the collection of dues or premiums (away from the home office) for a fraternal beneficiary society, order, or association, or is ritualistic service (wherever performed) in connection with such an organization; or (iii), without regard to amount of remuneration, if the service is performed by in connection with such an organization; of (iii), without regard to amount of remuneration, if the service is performed by a student enrolled and regularly attending classes at a school, college, or university. Organizations so exempt from income tax and thus within this provision include the following: Certain labor, agricultural, and horticultural organizations, mutual savings banks, fraternal beneficiary societies, building and loan associations, cooperative banks, credit unions, cemetery companies, business leagues chambers of commercia real-extate boards boards. business leagues, chambers of commerce, real-estate boards, boards or trade, civic leagues, local associations of employees, social clubs, local benevolent life insurance associations, mutual irrigation and telephone companies, farmers' or other mutual hail, cyclone, casualty, or fire insurance companies or associations, farmers' cooperative marketing and purchasing associations, corporations organized to finance crop operations, voluntary employees' beneficiary associations, and religious or apostolic associations or corporations. of trade, civic leagues, local associations of employees, social clubs,

Paragraph (10), clause (B), excepts service in the employ of an agricultural or horticultural organization, regardless of the amount of remuneration. These organizations are identical with agricultural and horticultural organizations exempt from income tax under section 101 (1) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Paragraph (10), clause (C), excepts service in the employ of a voluntary employees' beneficiary association, providing for payment of life, sick, accident, or other benefits to the members of such association or their dependents, if (i) no part of its net such association or their dependents, if (1) no part of its net earnings inures (other than through such payments) to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual, and (ii) 85 percent or more of the income consists of amounts collected from members for the sole purpose of making such payments and meeting expenses. This exemption is identical with that of these organizations under section 101 (16) of the Internal Revenue Code organizations under section 101 (16) of the Internal Revenue Code and will have the same scope.

Paragraph (10), clause (D), excepts all service performed in the employ of a voluntary employees' beneficiary association providing for the payment of life, sick, accident, or other benefits to the members of such association or their dependents or designated beneficiaries, if (i) admission to membership in such association is limited to individuals who are employees of the United States Government, and (ii) no part of the net earnings of such association inures (other than through such payments) to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual.

Paragraph (10), clause (E), excepts service performed in any of any private shareholder or individual.

Paragraph (10), clause (E), excepts service performed in any calendar quarter in the employ of a school, college, or university, not exempt from income tax, if such service is performed by a student enrolled and regularly attending classes at such school, college, or university, and the remuneration for such service does not exceed $45. In determining the remuneration, for purposes of the $45 limitation, the value of room, board, and tuition, if furnished by the school, college, or university as part of the remuneration, would be excluded.

A calendar quarter is any period of 3 calendar months ending on March 31, June 30, September 30, or December 31.

Paragraph (11) excepts service performed in the employ of a Paragraph (11) excepts service performed in the employ of a foreign government, and paragraph (12) similarly excepts, on a basis of reciprocity, service performed in the employ of an instrumentality wholly owned by a foreign government. These paragraphs are, by section 902 (f) of the bill, made retroactively effective to the date of the enactment of the Social Security Act.

Paragraph (13) excepts service performed as a student nurse in Paragraph (13) excepts service performed as a student nurse in the employ of a hospital or a nurse's training school by an individual who is enrolled and is regularly attending classes in such a school chartered or approved pursuant to State law; and service performed as an interne (as distinguished from a resident doctor) in the employ of a hospital by an individual who has completed a 4 years' course in a medical school chartered or approved pursuant to State law. suant to State law.

Section 209 (c): This section relates to an employee who has performed both included and excluded service for the same employer during a pay period. It provides that if one-half or more of the services constitutes included employment, all of such service will be included; but that if less than one-half constitutes included employment, all will be excluded. The provision does not apply to the service of an employee in a pay period if any of the service of the employee in the pay period is covered under the relirond retirement system. railroad retirement system.

Definition of American vessel

Section 209 (d): This term is defined to mean any vessel documented or numbered under the laws of the United States; and also to include any vessel neither so documented nor numbered nor documented under the laws of any foreign country while the crew is in the employ only of citizens or residents of the United States or corporations organized under the laws of the United States or of any State.

Primary insurance benefit defined

Section 209 (e) defines the term "primary insurance benefit" section 209 (e) defines the term "primary insurance benefit" and is the basis for the computation of benefits under section 202. "Primary insurance benefit" means an amount equal to the sum of the following: (1) (A) 40 percent of the amount of an individual's average monthly wage, if such average monthly wage exceeds $50, or (B) if such average monthly wage exceeds $50, 40 percent of $50, plus 10 percent of the amount by which such average monthly wage exceeds $50, and (2) an amount equal to 1 percent of the amount computed under (1) above multiplied by the number of years in which $200 or more of wages were naid by the number of years in which $200 or more of wages were paid to such individual. This section sets forth the method of computing the amount of a primary insurance benefit for a month. In the case of a living individual such amount is the amount payable as a benefit under section 202 (a). Such amount also serves as the basis for computing, in the case of a living or deceased individual, any other benefit (or a lump sum) which may be payable on the basis of such individual's wages.

Section 209 (f) defines the term "average monthly wage" as used in the formula set forth in subsection (e) to mean the quotient obtained by dividing the total wages paid an individual before the year in which he died or became entitled to receive primary insurance benefits, whichever first occurred, by 12 times the number of years elapsing after 1936 and before such year in which he died or became so entitled, excluding any year prior to the year in which he attained the age of 22 during which he was paid less than $200. In no case, however, shall such total wages be divided by a number less than 36.

Section 209 (g) defines the term "fully insured individual." Since this definition will determine the earnings requirements for eligibility for all primary insurance benefits, and therefore for a number of benefits for dependents of individuals with primary insurance benefits, it will substantially affect the extent to which benefit payments will be a charge against the Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund. The definition is designed, therefore, adequately to protect the trust fund and at the same time (a) to afford some heaft, protection to individuals who have now at adequately to protect the trust fund and at the same time (a) to afford some benefit protection to individuals who have now attained or are approaching age 65 (and their dependents), and who since the old-age insurance provisions of the Social Security Act became effective have ordinarily had little opportunity to build up large wage credits (see par. (1) and (2) of definition); (b) to establish reasonable but somewhat stricter requirements for individuals who will have a longer time in which to accumulate qualifying who will have a longer time in which to accumulate qualifying wages (see par. (3) of definition); and (c) to take care of individuals who have been paid wages in covered employment over a long period of time (see par. (4) of definition). The following summary of the definition will indicate its general effect:

viduals who have been paid wages in covered employment over a long period of time (see par. (4) of definition). The following summary of the definition will indicate its general effect:

Paragraph (1) of the definition provides that individuals who attain age 65 prior to the year 1940, in order to become fully insured individuals, must have not less than 2 years of coverage (explained in definition) and have been paid not less than $600 in wages. This is a flat minimum requirement which applies without regard to the particular year in which an individual attained age 65.

Paragraph (2) of the definition applies to individuals who die or attain age 65 after 1939 and before 1946. It provides a formula for determining the requirements for becoming a fully insured individual, based on the number of years elapsing after 1936 and up to and including the year of death or attainment of age 65. If an individual dies in 1940, he must have at least 3 years of coverage and $800 in wages. Every second year after 1940 (beginning in 1942) the number of years of coverage required increases by $200 over the amount required for the preceding year. Thus, an individual dying or attaining age 65 in 1945 must have 5 years of coverage and $1,800 in wages to be fully insured.

Paragraph (3) provides a formula for determining the requirements for individuals who die or attain age 65 in 1946 or thereafter. The determination is based on the number of years elapsing after 1936 or after the year in which an individual attained age 21 (if he attained that age after 1936) and up to and including the year of death or attainment of age 65, subject to a minimum of 5 years of coverage and minimum wages of $2,000. The provision continues the same rate of increase in coverage requirements from year to year, as provided under paragraph (2), but in no event are wages in excess of $2,000 required. The minimum coverage provisions are applicable only in cases where the number of years of coverage determined in accordance with the formula is below the m

Currently insured individual

Section 209 (h) defines the term "currently insured individual" Section 209 (h) defines the term "currently insured individual" to mean any individual with respect to whom it appears to the satisfaction of the Board that he has been paid wages of not less than $50 for each of not less than 6 of the 12 calendar quarters immediately preceding the quarter in which he died. The purpose of this provision is, while avoiding an unwarranted drain on the trust fund, to provide protection for the surviving dependents of individuals who are paid a certain minimum amount of wages in covered employment within the last 3 years before death, but who have not worked in such employment long enough and have not been paid sufficient wages to have qualified them as fully insured individuals.

Section 209 (1) defines the term "wife" to mean the wife of an individual who was married to him prior to January 1, 1939, or, if later, prior to the day upon which he attained the age of 60.

Section 209 (j) defines the term "widow" (except as used in sec. 202 (g)) as the surviving dependent wife of an individual who was married to him prior to the beginning of the twelfth month before the month in which he died.

Section 209 (k) defines the term "child" (except as used in sec. 202 (g)) as the child of an individual, and the stepchild of an individual by a marriage contracted prior to the date upon which he

Definition of "agricultural labor"

Section 209 (1): The present law exempts "agricultural labor" without defining the term. It has been difficult to delimit the application of the term with the certainty required for administration and for general understanding by employers and employees

Your committee believes that greater exactness should be given to the exception and that it should be broadened to include as "agricultural labor" certain services not at present exempt, as such services are an integral part of farming activities. In the case of many of such services, it has been found that the incidence of the taxes falls exclusively upon the farmer, a factor which, in numerous instances, has resulted in the establishment of competitive advantages on the part of large farm operators to the detriment of the smaller ones

Paragraph (1) of this subsection exempts service performed on a farm, in the employ of any person, in connection with cultivating the soil, or in connection with raising or harvesting any agricultural or horticultural commodity, including the raising, feeding, and management of livestock, bees, poultry, and fur-bearing animals. Such services are exempt under existing law only if performed in the employ of the owner or tenant of the farm on which they are rendered. Services performed on a farm in connection they are rendered. Services performed on a farm in connection with the raising, feeding, and management of fur-bearing animals, such as foxes, not now exempted, will be exempt under paragraph (1). This paragraph also continues the existing exclusion of services performed on a farm in the raising or harvesting of horticultural commodities, including flowers and nursery products, such as young fruit trees, ornamental plants, and shrubs.

Paragraph (2) of the subsection excepts services in the employ of the owner (whether or not such owner is in possession) or tenant of a farm in connection with the operation, management, or maintenance of such farm, if the major part of those services is performed on a farm. Under this language certain services are to be regarded as agricultural even though they are not performed in conducting any of the operations referred to in paragraph (1). Services performed in connection with the "operation, management, or maintenance" of a farm may include, for example, services performed by carpenters, painters, farm supervisors, irrigation engineers, bookkeepers, and other skilled or semiskilled workers whose services contribute in any way to the proper conduct of the farm or farms operated by their employer. Some of these services at present constitute covered employment under some circumfarm or farms operated by their employer. Some of these services at present constitute covered employment under some circumstances but not under other circumstances. It is stipulated that the services referred to in this paragraph must be performed in the employ of the owner or tenant of the farm so that the exemption will not extend to services performed by such persons as employees of a commercial painting concern, for example, which contracts with a farmer to renovate his farm properties. Paragraph (3) extends the exception to services performed in connection with certain specified products and operations. Ordinarily these services are performed on a farm or are of such a character as to warrant no different treatment than is accorded services performed in connection with farming activities. In order that a uniform rule may be applied in the case of these services services performed in connection with farming activities. In order that a uniform rule may be applied in the case of these services, they will be excepted whether or not performed on a farm or in the employ of the owner or tenant of a farm. In the case of maple sap, the exemption will extend to services in connection with the processing of the sap into maple sugar or maple sirup, but not in the subsequent blending or other processing of such sugar or sirup with other products. Under the present exception services performed in connection with the production of maple sirup or maple sugar do not constitute "agricultural labor." Similarly, the existing exception does not extend to services performed in connection with the growing, harvesting, processing, packing, and transporting to market of oleoresin, gum spirits of turpentine, and gum resin. Under this paragraph, however, the exception will apply to services performed in connection with the production or harvesting of crude gum (oleoresin) from a living tree and of the following products as processed only by the original producer of the crude gum (oleoresin): Gum spirits of turpentine and gum resin, as defined in the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended. Services performed in connection with any ing Act, as amended. Services performed in connection with any hatching of poultry and in connection with the ginning of cotton hatching of poultry and in connection with the ginning of cotton will also be excepted. Services performed in connection with the raising or harvesting of mushrooms constitute "agricultural labor" under existing law, only when performed on a farm. The fact that mushrooms are not usually grown under ordinary field conditions but are grown in cellars, caves, barns, or in sheds specially constructed for the purpose has resulted in the employees of some growers being covered while employees of others are not. Under this paragraph all such services will be excepted.

Paragraph (4) of the subsection extends the exemption to service though not performed in the employ of the owner or tenant of a

(though not performed in the employ of the owner or tenant of a farm) performed in the handling, freezing, grading, storing, or de-livering to storage or to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, any agricultural or horticultural commodity, provided such service is performed as an incident to ordinary farming oper-ations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the ations or, in the case of fruits and vegetables, as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. The provisions of the paragraph, however, do not extend to services performed in connection with commercial canning or commercial freezing, nor to services performed in connection with any agricultural or horticultural commodity after its delivery to a terminal market for distribution for consumption. The expression "as an incident to ordinary farming operations" is, in general, intended to cover all services of the character described in the paragraph which are ordinarily performed by the employees of a farmer or by employees of a farmers' cooperative organization or group, as a prerequisite to the marketing, in its unmanufactured state, of any agricultural or horticultural commodity produced by such farmer or by the memhorticultural commodity produced by such farmer or by the members of such organization or group. The expression also includes the delivery of such commodity to the place where, in the ordinary and natural course of the particular kind of farming operations involved, the commodity accumulates in storage for distribution into the usual channels of commerce and consumption. To the extent the usual channels of commerce and consumption. To the extent that such farmers, organizations, or groups engage in the handling, etc., of commodities other than those of their own production or that of their members, such handling, etc., is not regarded as being carried on "as an incident to ordinary farming operations." In such a case the rules set forth in subsection (c) of this section apply. In the case of fruits and vegetables, however, whether or not of a perishable nature, services performed in the handling, drying, packing, etc., of those commodities constitute "agricultural labor" even though not performed as an incident to ordinary farming even though not performed as an incident to ordinary farming operations, provided they are rendered as an incident to the preparation of such fruits or vegetables for market. Under this portion ration of such fruits or vegetables for market. Under this portion of the paragraph, for example, services performed in the sorting or grading of citrus fruits or in the cleaning of beans, as an incident to their preparation for market, will be excepted irrespective of whether performed in the employ of a farmer, a farmers' cooperative, or a commercial handler of such commodities.

Since the services referred to in this paragraph must be rendered in the actual handling, drying, etc., of the commodity, the paragraph does not exempt services performed by stenographers, book-keepers, clerks, and other office employees in the employ of farmers, farmers' cooperative organizations or groups, or commercial handlers. To the extent that services of this character are performed in the employ of the owner or tenant of a farm, however, and are in the employ of the owner or tenant of a farm, however, and are rendered in major part on a farm, they may be exempt under the provisions of paragraph (2).

The last sentence of the subsection makes it clear that the term "farm" as used in this subsection has a broad and comprehensive The term, for example, includes fur-bearing animal farms. meaning. The term, for example, includes fur-bearing animal farms. Under present law, services performed in connection with the operation of such farms constitute covered employment. The term also includes greenhouses or other similar structures used primarily for the raising of agricultural or horticultural commodities, regardless of their location. Under the existing exception, labor performed in some greenhouses is excepted while labor in others is not. The inclusion of greenhouses of the kind specified, within the meaning of the term "farm," will make for a more uniform treatment of greenhouse labor and lessen the administrative difficulties which this class of term "farm," will make for a more uniform treatment of greenhouse labor and lessen the administrative difficulties which this class of cases presents. Greenhouses used primarily for purposes such as storage or display purposes or for the fabrication of wreaths and corsages (usually in connection with the operation of a retail establishment) do not, of course, come within the exception.

Section 209 (m) provides that determination of whether an applicant is the wife, widow, parent, or child of an individual is to be made by applying such law as the courts of the State of domicile of the individual would apply in determining the devolution of intestate personal property or if such individual was not domiciled in a State, by the courts of the District of Columbia; also that applicants who according to such law have the same status as a wife, widow. who according to such law have the same status as a wife, widow, parent, or child shall be deemed such.

Section 209 (n) provides that a wife shall be deemed to be living with her husband if they are both members of the same household, or she is receiving regular contributions from him toward her support, or he has been ordered by any court to contribute to her support; and that a widow shall be deemed to have been living with her husband at the time of his death if they were both members of the same household at the time of his death, or she was receiving regular contributions from him toward her support on such date, or he had been ordered by any court to contribute to her support.

TITLE III-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE III OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT PAYMENTS TO STATES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ADMINISTRATION

Section 301: This section substitutes the word "for" for the word "in" in the phrase "during the fiscal year in which such payment is to be made" in the first sentence of section 302 (a) of the Social Security Act. This amendment is recommended in order to authorize the Board to certify unemployment compensation administration grants for proper administrative expenses, regardless of whether incurred within the fiscal year in which the grant is made. This amendment is necessary because of the practical difficulty of determining and certifying with exactness grants to finance all expenses incurred during the fiscal year before the end of that year. The substitution of the phrase "proper and efficient administration" for the phrase "proper administration" in this subsection is made to conform the language of this subsection with similar language in the amended sections 2 (a), 402 (a), 503 (a), 513 (a), and 1002 (a) of the Social Security Act. This insertion does not effect any substantive changes in this subsection. The reference in this subsection to the Internal Revenue Code recognizes the substitution of provisions of the code for the pertinent provisions of title IX of the Social Security Act (the cld reference). This amendment is recommended in order to author-

PROVISIONS OF STATE UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION LAWS

Section 302: This section makes certain amendments to the requirements made by section 303 (a) of the Social Security Act which a State unemployment compensation law must meet in order to qualify for grants for administrative expenses.

The reference to the Internal Revenue Code, contained in the introductory sentence, recognizes the substitution of provisions of the code for the pertinent provisions of title IX of the Social Security Act (the old reference).

The amendments made by this section to paragraphs (2), (4), and (5) of section 303 (a) of the Social Security Act are designed to make clear that the State may refund contributions paid into the State-fund by mistake, and also that cooperative arrangements may be made for payment of compensation (in the case of workers who have moved from the State in which their compensation rights were earned) by one State through employment offices in another State. In addition, the amendments would authorize the refund of contributions paid with respect to a taxable year by national banks and other instrumentalities of the United States under the proposed amendment to section 1606 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 906 of the Social Security Act) if the State law under which such contributions were collected is not certified by the Board with respect to that year under section 1603.

Another change in paragraph (5) substitutes a reference to the

Another change in paragraph (5) substitutes a reference to the State unemployment fund for the (Federal) unemployment trust fund. This is done because the (Federal) unemployment trust fund is in substance merely a place of deposit for State moneys fund is in substance merely a place of deposit for State moneys rather than a fund out of which benefit payments are to be made. The amendment makes no change in paragraphs (3) and (6). New paragraphs (3) and (9) would make it necessary for the State law to include provision for the expenditure of funds paid to the State for the administration of its unemployment-compensation law only for the purposes of and in the amounts found necessary by the Board for the proper and efficient administration of the State law; and for the replacement within a reasonable time of any such funds which by any action or contingency have been lost or have been expended for purposes other than, or in amounts in excess of, those found necessary by the Board for the proper and efficient administration of the State law. The purpose of these requirements is to minimize the possibility of the Board having to refuse to certify an amount for State administrative expenses because of misapplication or loss of previously granted funds for administrative purposes. ministrative purposes.

In order to enable the States to make the necessary changes in their unemployment-compensation laws without incurring the expense of special legislative sessions, the effective date of these two paragraphs is postponed until July 1, 1941.

TITLE IV-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE IV OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT CHANGES IN REQUIREMENTS FOR STATE PLANS FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

Section 401: This section amends section 402 (a) of the Social Security Act. Section 402 (a) sets out in clauses (1) through (6) certain basic requirements which a State plan for aid to dependent children must meet in order to be approved by the Social Security Section 401 (a) amends clause (5) so as to make it clear the methods of administration of the State plan must be proper as well as efficient.

Section 401 (b) adds a new clause, numbered (7), which becomes effective July 1, 1941. Under this clause the State plan must provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any income and resources of any child claiming aid under this title. It also adds a new clause, numbered (8) effective July 1, 1941, which requires that the State plan must provide safeguards which restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of aid to dependent children. These new provisions are similar to those added to title I of the Social Security Act by section 101 of the bill.

PAYMENT TO STATES FOR AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN

Section 402: Subsection (a) of this section amends section 403 of the Social Security Act and will become effective on January 1, 1940. Existing law provides for a Federal grant to States having an approved plan for aid to dependent children in an amount equal to one-third of the total of the sums expended under any such plan, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any dependent child for any month as exceeds $18, or if there is more than one dependent child in the same home, as exceeds $18 for any month with respect to one such dependent child and $12 for such month with respect to each of the other dependent children. The committee amendment increases the Federal share to one-half and conforms subsection (b) (1) to this change.

Subsection (b) of this section provides that the Board, in making grants to States, shall reduce the amount to be paid to any State for any quarter by a sum equivalent to the pro rata share to which the United States is equitably entitled, as determined by the Board, of the net amount recovered by the State or any political subdivision thereof with respect to aid to dependent children furnished under the State plan. The provision is a new one and is similar in scope and operation to the one included by section 102 of the bill in section 3 (b) (2) of title I of the Social Security Act, except that it does not include the proviso relating to funeral expenses of a deceased recipient.

DEFINITION OF DEPENDENT CHILD

Section 403: This section amends the definition of "dependent child," contained in section 406 (a) of the Social Security Act, so that its provisions will conform to section 401 of the act, which that its provisions will conform to section 401 of the act, which authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish financial assistance to needy dependent children. Section 403 of the bill also amends section 406 (a) of the Social Security Act by including within the meaning of the term "dependent child," a child under the age of 18 if found by the State agency to be regularly attending school. The present definition includes only children under the age of 16. The change will assist the States to aid children who are over 16 and under 18 years of age but are still attending school.

TITLE V-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE V OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT CHANGE IN REQUIREMENTS FOR STATE PLANS FOR MATERNAL AND CHILD-HEALTH SERVICES

Section 501: This section amends clause (3) of section 503 (a) of the Social Security Act so as to make it clear that the methods of administration of a State plan for maternal and child-health services must be proper as well as efficient. This change is similar to that made in the corresponding provisions of titles I, IV, and X.

CHANGE IN REQUIREMENTS FOR STATE PLANS FOR SERVICES FOR CRIPPLED CHILDREN

Section 502: This section amends clause (3) of section 513 (a) of the Social Security Act so as to make it clear that the methods of administration of a State plan for services for crippled children must be proper as well as efficient. This change is similar to that made in the corresponding provisions of titles I, IV, and X.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION

Section 503: This section increases the authorization of appropriations for grants to the States and Hawaii for vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons by increasing the amount authorized for this purpose for each fiscal year by section 531 of the Social Security Act from $1,938,000 to $2,938,000.

TITLE VI-AMENDMENTS TO THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE FEDERAL INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

TAXES UNDER SECTIONS 1400 AND 1410 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE (FORMERLY SECTIONS 801 AND 804 OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT)

Sections 601 and 604: Under the existing provisions of sections 1400 and 1410 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly secs. 801 and 804, respectively, of the Social Security Act) the rate of tax on employees and the rate of tax on employers are each scheduled to increase on January 1, 1940, from 1 percent of the wages to 1½ percent, with a further increase of ½ percent at the expiration of succeeding 3-year periods until the maximum rate of 3 percent on employees and 3 percent on employers is reached in 1949. Under the amendment the increase scheduled for January 1, 1940, would be eliminated, and the rate of each tax would be as follows: be eliminated, and the rate of each tax would be as follows:

Percent For the calendar years 1939, 1940, 1941, and 1942______ For the calendar years 1943, 1944, and 1945______ For the calendar years 1946, 1947, and 1948_____ 1 2 For the calendar year 1949 and subsequent calendar years____

A further change is made by this amendment. Sections 1400 and 1410 of the Internal Revenue Code now provide that the rate of tax applicable to wages is the rate in effect at the time of the performance of the services for which the wages are paid. This will unnecessarily complicate the making of returns and This will unnecessarily complicate the making of returns and the collection of the taxes in later years when the rate of tax has been increased. For example, in 1943 the rate of tax increases from 1 percent to 2 percent. Thus, wages which are paid in 1943 for services performed in 1942 will be subject to the 1-percent rate, while wages paid in 1943 for services performed in that year will be subject to the 2-percent rate. Provision must therefore be made in the return for 1943 for the reporting of wages subject to the different rates, and, in auditing the returns, it will be necessary to ascertain not merely the time when the wages subject to the different rates, and, in auditing the returns, it will be necessary to ascertain not merely the time when the wages were paid and received, but also the year of the rendition of the services for which the wages are paid. If employers have falled to make the proper distinction, many refunds and additional assessments will doubtless be necessary and confusion will result. Under the amendment the rate applicable would be the rate in effect at the time that the wages are paid and received without reference to the rate which was in effect at the time the services were performed. the services were performed.

ADJUSTMENTS OF OVERPAYMENT AND UNDERPAYMENT OF EMPLOYEES' TAX

Section 602: Present section 1401 (c) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 802 (b) of the Social Security Act) is designed to permit the employer to adjust, without interest, overpayments and underpayments of employees' tax without the necessity in the former case of requiring the filing of a claim for refund and in the latter case of the making of a demand by the collector for the additional tax. The existing provisions of the section require that the adjustment be made in connection with subsequent wage payments. The different types of situations obtaining at the time the error is discovered and should be corrected are at the time the error is discovered and should be corrected are numerous. For example, the employee may be continuously em-ployed and receiving remuneration at regular intervals, or he may be entitled to no remuneration for some time to come, or if he is entitled to remuneration, it may not be taxable because his service is rendered temporarily, or for an indefinite time, in a foreign country, or because he has already received $3,000 from the employer for services rendered during the calendar year, the maximum taxable remuneration under section 1426 (a) of the National Personal Code (Sympoly) and 14 (b) of the Social Section 1426 (b) of the Social Section 1426 (c) of the Social S maximum taxable remuneration under section 1426 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 811 (a) of the Social Security Act), or the employee's connection with the employer who made the error may have been severed. Moreover, undercollections require a procedure different from that in the case of overcollections. The use of the term "wage payments" causes difficulty since the term "wages" has a restricted meaning for the purpose of this tax. Furthermore, it may prove desirable in certain circumstances to provide for adjustments at times other than in connection with subsequent payments of remuneration to the individual. This amendment, by use of the word "remuneration" instead of "wage" and by leaving the manner and time of the adjustment to be prescribed by regulations, will enable the administrative officers to meet the varied situations which arise.

RECEIPTS FOR EMPLOYEES

Section 603: This section amends subchapter A of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly title VIII of the Social Secur-ity Act) by inserting a new section in such subchapter. Subsection (a) of the new section requires every employer to furnish each employee with a written statement or statements, in a form suitable for retention by the employee, showing the taxable wages paid able for retention by the employee, showing the taxable wages paid to the employee after December 31, 1939, for services rendered in his employ, and the amount of tax imposed by section 1400 with respect to such wages. In addition, the names of the employer and employee, and the period covered by the statement, are to be shown. Each statement, or receipt, must cover one or more, but not more than four, calendar quarters. Under existing Treasury regulations the employer is required to file a return for each calendar quarter with the collector of internal revenue, showing the amount of wages paid to each employee. By requiring the receipts to cover one or more calendar quarters, the employer is enabled, in making out such receipts, to use the amounts of wages of each employee as shown on the copies of the quarterly returns which the employer as shown on the copies of the quarterly returns which the employer retains. Returns, under existing Treasury regulations, must be filed with the collector within the calendar month following the close of the quarter. The section gives employers an additional month within which to furnish their employees with the receipts. However, when an employee leaves the employ of the employer, the final receipt, covering the period from the termination of the period covered by the last preceding receipt furnished the employee, is to be given the employee when the final payment of wages is made to him. If the employer chooses, he may under the section furnish a receipt to an employee at the time of each payment of wages during a calendar quarter, in lieu of covering in a single receipt the total wages paid to the employee during such quarter.

wages paid to the employee during such quarter.
Subsection (b) provides that any employer who willfully fails to furnish a statement to an employee in the manner, at the time, and showing the information, required under subsection (a), shall for each such failure be subject to a civil penalty of not more than $5.

TAXES UNDER SECTION 1410 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE (FORMERLY SECTION 804 OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT)

Section 604: See section 601, supra.

ADJUSTMENT OF EMPLOYERS' TAX

Section 605: The amendment made by this section to section 1411 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 805 of the Social Security Act), relating to adjustments of employers' tax, is intended to accomplish the same purpose as the corresponding amendment to section 1401 (c) of the code, relating to adjustments of employees' tax. See section 602, supra.

DEFINITIONS

Section 606: This section, effective January 1, 1940, amends section 1426 of the Internal Revenue Code, containing definitions applicable in the case of the old-age insurance taxes.

Definition of wages

Section 1426 (a): This subsection continues the present definition of wages, but excludes certain payments heretofore included. Paragraph (2) excludes all payments made by the employer to or on behalf of an employee or former employee, under a plan or system providing for retirement benefits (including pensions), or disability benefits (including medical and hospitalization expenses), but not life insurance. These payments will be excluded even though the amount or possibility of such payments is taken into consideration in fixing the amount of remuneration and even though such payments are required, either expressly or impliedly, by the contract of employment. Since it is the practice of some employers to provide for such payments through insurance or the establishment and maintenance of funds for the purpose, the premiums or insurance payments and the payments made into or out of any fund will likewise be excluded from wages. Paragraph (3) expressly excludes from wages the payment by an employer (without deduction from the remuneration of, or other reimbursement from, the employee) of the employee's tax imposed by section 1400 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 801 of the Social Security Act) and employee contributions under State unemployment compensation laws. Paragraph (4) excludes dismissal payments which the employer is not legally obligated to make.

Definition of employment

Section 1426 (b): This term is defined to mean any service performed prior to January 1, 1940, which constituted employment as defined in this section prior to such date; and to mean any service performed after December 31, 1939, by an employee for the person employing him, irrespective of the citizenship or residence of the contraction of the contracti of either, (A) within the United States or (B) on or in connection with an American vessel (defined in subsection (h)) under a contract of service entered into within the United States or during the performance of which the vessel touches a port therein, if the employee is employed on and in connection with the vessel when outside the United States. No substantive change in existing law is effected by the introductory paragraph of this provision except the extension of the definition to include service on American vessels. This extension is designed to include, with the qualifications noted, all service which is attached to or connected with the vessel (e. g., service by officers and members of the crew and other employees such as those of concessionaires). Individuals who are passengers on the vessel in the generally accepted sense, such as an employed of an American department store going abroad, will not be included because such service has no connection with the vessel. Service performed on or in connection with an American vessel within the United States will be on the same basis as regards inclusion as other service performed within the United States.

Under existing law service performed within the United States (which otherwise constitutes employment) is covered irrespective (which otherwise constitutes employment) is covered irrespective of the citizenship or residence of the employer or employee. The amendment makes clear that this will be true also in the case of maritime service covered by the amendment, regardless of whether performed within or without the United States. The basic reasons which caused the original coverage to be made without distinctions on account of citizenship or residence apply in the case of seamen. The number of foreign seamen who may be employed on American vessels engaged in trade is limited under our shipping

The definition of the term "employment" under the amendment, as applied to service rendered prior to January 1, 1940, retains the exemptions contained in the present law. The definition applicable to service rendered on and after that date continues unchanged some of the present exemptions, revises others, and adds certain additional ones.

Paragraph (1) continues the exception of agricultural labor, but Paragraph (1) continues the exception of agricultural labor, but a new subsection (i) defines the term for purposes of the exclusion. Paragraph (2) continues the present exception of domestic service in a local college club, or local chapter of a college fraternity or sorority (not including alumni clubs or chapters). Thus services of cook, waiter, chambermaid, and the house mother, performed for these local clubs and chapters are executed.

sorcity (not including alumni clubs or chapters). Thus services of cook, waiter, chambermaid, and the house mother, performed for these local clubs and chapters, are exempt.

Paragraph (3) continues the present exception of casual labor not in the course of the employer's trade or business.

A new paragraph (4) excludes service performed by an individual in the employ of his son, daughter, or spouse, and service performed by a child under the age of 21 in the employ of his parent. This exclusion is already contained in the Federal unemployment tax provisions of the existing law. The old paragraph (4), which excluded service performed by an individual who has attained the age of 65, is repealed.

Paragraphs (5) to (13), inclusive, are identical with the same paragraphs in section 209 (b) of the Social Security Act. For detailed analysis of such paragraphs see pp. 46-49 of this report.

Section 1426 (c): This subsection relates to an employee who has both included and excluded service for the same employer during a pay period. It provides that if one-half or more of the services constitutes included employment, all of such service will be included; but that if less than one-half constitutes included employment, all will be excluded.

The provision does not apply to the service of an employee in a pay period if any of the service of the employee in the pay period is covered under subchapter B of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly the Carriers Taxing Act of 1937).

Definition of employee

Section 1426 (d): This definition is identical with the definition in section 1101 (a) (6) of the Social Security Act, which is applicable to title II (see sec. 801 of the bill). The amendment to the definition relates to salesmen. In some instances where remuneration nition relates to salesmen. In some instances where remuneration is by way of commission and the services are performed away from the place of business of the person for whom they are performed, the individual performing the services is held to be an employee, while in others he is held not to be an employee. A restricted view of the employer-employee relationship should not be taken in the administration of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system in making coverage determinations. The tests for determining the relationship laid down in cases relating to tort liability and to the common-law concept of master and servant should not be narrowly common-law concept of master and servant should not be narrowly applied. In certain cases even the most liberal view as to the existence of the employer-employee relationship will fall short of coverence of the employer-employee relationship with the short of covering individuals who should be covered, for example, certain classes of salesmen. In the case of salesmen, it is thought desirable to extend coverage even where all of the usual elements of the employer-employee relationship are wholly lacking and where accordingly even under the liberal application of the law the court would not ordinarily find the existence of the master-and-servant relationship. It is the intention of this amendment to set up specific standards so that individuals performing services as salesmen may be uniformly covered without the necessity of applying any of the usual tests as to the relationship of employer and employee.

A salesman in business as a broker or factor is excluded if the services are performed as part of such business, and, in furtherance of such business, similar services are performed for other persons and one or more employees of such salesman perform a substantial part of such services; and an individual whose services as a salesman are casual services, not in the course of such individual's principal trade, business, or occupation, is not included in the definition.

This definition is not intended to affect the employer employer.

This definition is not intended to affect the employer-employee status of a salesman and the employee of such salesman. Thus the business chauffeur who has been an employee of a salesman will remain solely the employee of such salesman.

Definition of employer

Section 1426 (e): This new definition is for the purpose of making clear that the extension of the broadened employee concept also broadens the employer concept. Thus where a salesman is held to be an employee, the person for whom the salesman performs the services is the employer. For example, an insurance solicitor who executes a contract with an insurance company under which he performs services as a salesman would be the employee of the insurance company and not of the general agent of the company.

Section 1426 (f) and (g), defining the terms "State" and "person," respectively, makes no change in the existing definitions of these terms.

Definitions of American vessel and agricultural labor

Subsections (h) and (i) of section 1426 are identical with subsections (d) and (l) of section 209 of the Social Security Act. For detailed analysis of such subsections see pages 49 and 51 of this Section 607: This section inserts a new section in subchapter A of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code which provides that the subchapter may be cited as the "Federal Insurance Contributions Act.'

FEDERAL UNEMPLOYMENT TAX ACT

TAXES UNDER SECTION 1600 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE (FORMERLY SEC. 901 OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT)

Section 608: This amendment changes the basis for determining tax liability under subchapter C of chapter 9 of the Internal Revetax liability under subchapter C of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly title IX of the Social Security Act) from "wages payable" to "wages paid." That subchapter is thus brought into conformity with subchapter A of chapter 9 (formerly title VIII of the Social Security Act), which also imposes a tax on "wages paid." Wages, for the purpose of these taxes, are considered paid when they are actually paid, or when they are constructively paid, i. e., credited to the account of, or set apart for, the wage earner so that they may be drawn upon by him at any time although not then actually reduced to possession.

Under the existing law wages are "payable" with respect to em-actually reduced to possession.

Under the existing law wages are "payable" with respect to employment during a calendar year, even though the amount of wages is not fixed and no right exists to enforce payment at any time during that year. Thus a bonus paid in 1939 for services performed in 1938 constitutes "wages payable" for 1938, even though the amount of the bonus may not have been known in 1938 and no obligation to pay it existed in that year.

In cases in which remuneration for services of an employee in a particular year is based on a percentage of profits, or on future particular year is based on a percentage of profits, or on future royalties, the amount of which cannot be determined until long after the close of the year, the employer has been required to estimate unascertained amounts and pay taxes and contributions on that basis. If he has overestimated, subsequent corrections on the return must be made with consequent refunds. If the employer has underestimated, additional taxes may become due and he may also be compelled to pay additional State contributions, which are usually not allowable as credit because not timely paid. The attendant difficulties and confusion cause a burden on employers and administrative authorities alike. The placing of this tax on the "wages paid" basis will relieve this situation.

With both the old-age-insurance tax and the unemployment-compensation tax on the "wages paid" basis, the keeping of records by employers will be simplified.

The new basis of taxation will apply to all wages for services rendered after the beginning of 1939. Insofar as the amendment would be retroactive with respect to the year 1939, it would not increase the tax liability of any taxpayer.

CREDIT AGAINST TAX

Section 609: This section relates only to the tax with respect to services rendered in 1939 and thereafter.

Contributions to State unemployment funds

Section 1601 (a): The present section 1601 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 902 of the Social Security Act) provides that a taxpayer may credit against the Federal tax only contributions paid by him under a State law "with respect to employment," as defined in section 1607 of the Code (formerly sec. 907 of the act). Since the definition of employment in section 1607 restricts the meaning of the term to certain types of service, the taxpayer is not given credit for contributions made under a State law with respect to services not covered by the Federal law. Subdivision (1) eliminates the references in existing law to "employment," thus allowing the taxpayer to credit against the tax the contributions which he is required to pay, and which he actually pays, under a State law. The amendment also includes a requirement that credit shall be allowed only for contributions to an unemployment fund which has been maintained during the taxable year as specified in the amendment to section 1607 (f) of the Internal Revenue Code. (See sec. 614, infra.) Section 1601 (a): The present section 1601 (a) of the Internal

sec. 614, infra.)
Subdivision (2) provides that credit shall be permitted against the tax for the taxable year only for the amount of contributions paid with respect to such year. This effects no substantive change in the present law.

Subdivision (3) liberalizes existing law by giving employers more time within which to pay their contributions to the State and secure credit therefor against the Federal tax. Under existing law credit is allowable only for contributions with respect to the taxable year paid to the State before the due date of the Federal return for such year. The amendment permits full credit for contributions paid on (as well as before) the due date. The amendment further permits a credit for contributions paid after the due date of the Federal return but on or before June 30 next following the due date, but this credit is not to exceed 90 percent of the amount which would have been allowable as credit on account of such contributions if they had been paid on or before the due date. For example, if an employer's gross liability for Federal tax at the 3-percent rate is $100, and his liability for the same year for State contributions is also $100, and he paid such contributions on or before the due date of the Federal return, he would be entitled to the maximum credit (under the limitation provided in sec. 1601 (c)) of 90 percent of the Federal tax, or $90, and his net Federal tax would be $10. If, however, the employer paid the $100 in contributions after the due date but not later than June 30 next following, his credit would be 90 percent of $90, or $81, and his net Federal tax would be $19. No credit is allowable for contributions paid after June 30.

Thus substantial relief is given employers for 1939 and future

Thus substantial relief is given employers for 1939 and future years. Your committee is of the opinion that further liberalization of the conditions under which this credit would be allowable might endanger the orderly functioning of the system. It is desirable not to remove the aid provided in existing law to the State unemployto remove the aid provided in existing law to the State unemploy-ment-compensation systems which has been secured through the inducement to employers to pay their State contributions promptly. Furthermore, any change should be avoided which would impede the audit of the Federal returns or delay final determination of the taxpayer's liability beyond a reasonable time after the returns are filed. In proposing this amendment consideration has been given these factors as well as to the need for liberalization in favor of the Certain exceptions to the foregoing general rule are made in the amendment, however, to meet cases of genuine hardship.

Subdivision (3) removes the time limitation for payment of State contributions in those cases where the assets of the taxpayer are in the custody or control of a court at any time beginning with the due date and ending with the next following June 30, both dates inclusive.

Subdivision (4) grants relief in cases of payments made through mistake under the wrong unemployment-compensation law. In such a case payment under the proper State law with respect to the remuneration in question will be deemed, for the purposes of credit against the Federal tax, to have been made on the date of the erroneous payment. If the taxpayer's experience under the law of the wrong State had entitled him to cease paying any contributions for services subject to that law and by reason thereof the taxpayer had actually paid no contributions with respect to the remuneration in question, payment to the proper State will be treated, for such tax-credit purposes, as having been made on the date on which the Federal tax return was actually filed.

Subdivision (5) provides for refund of any tax (including any penalties and interest) which has been collected but with respect to which credit allowable under this section has not been taken. The law (including statutes of limitations) applicable in the case of erroneous or illegal collection of tax will apply to such refunds.

No interest will be paid on any such refund.

Additional credit

Section 1601 (b) (formerly sec. 909 (a) of the Social Security Act): This amendment changes in some particulars the existing law relating to additional credit allowance.

It expressly conditions the allowance of an additional credit upon certification of the State law under section 1603 (c) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 903 (b) of the Social Security Act) and under the proposed amendment to section 1602 (c). (See sec. 610,

It extends the additional credit to reduced rates of contributions required under a State law with respect to employment not covered by the Federal tax, thus bringing this subsection into conformity in that regard with the proposed amendment of subsection (a) (relating to contributions to State unemployment funds).

Under the amendment, additional credit allowance will be based on the difference between the amount of contributions the tax-payer was required to pay under the State law and the amount payer was required to pay under the State law and the amount he would have paid had he been subject under such State law to a rate of 2.7 percent, rather than on the difference between the amount the taxpayer actually paid under the State law and the highest rate applicable "from time to time" throughout the taxable year. This change, in addition to measuring the credit by 2.7 percent of the pay roll with respect to which contributions are required under the State law, also eliminates the possible necessity for measuring additional credits in terms of periods of less than

Limit on total credit

Section 1601 (c) restates the existing law limiting total credits against the Federal tax to not in excess of 90 percent of such tax. Since both the provision with respect to credits for contributions actually paid and the provisions with respect to additional credits are now included in one section of the law as subsections (a) and (b), respectively, it is unnecessary to include the limitation separately in respect to each subsection.

CONDITIONS OF ADDITIONAL CREDIT ALLOWANCE

Section 610 (a): This subsection amends the provisions of existing law (sec. 1602 of the Internal Revenue Code; formerly sec. 910 of the Social Security Act) relating to the requirements with respect to additional credit allowance.

The terms "employers," "employment," and "wages," which are defined in section 1607 and have special meanings not applicable here, are replaced by terms such as "persons having individuals in their employ," "services," and "remuneration," in order to make the requirements of this subsection more easily understandable in their application to State laws whose coverage differs from that of the Federal law. The phrase "person (or group of persons)" has been used in the standards with respect to all types of State funds, to make clear that a State law may measure, for individual experience-rating purposes, either an individual employer's record, or may permit two or more employers to combine their records and ed, for experience-rating purposes, as if they were a single be treated, for experience-rating purposes, as if they were a single-legal entity. Several verbal changes are suggested in this subsection in the interest of clarity.

In order to facilitate the administration of provisions in State laws allowing variations in rates of contributions, the term "computation date," defined in subsection (d) (7) of the code, has been adopted, and the phrase "year preceding the computation date" substituted for terms such as "preceding year" and "year," to permit the States to compute reduced rates as of a date prior to the date on which such reduced rates will become effective.

Section 1602 (a) of the code is amended by adding a new standard with respect to the allowance of additional credit, which requires that irrespective of the type of fund maintained under the State law, the State law will contain provisions whereby variations in rates of contributions as between different employers will be so computed as to yield, with respect to each year, a total amount of contributions substantially equivalent to 2.7 percent of the total pay rolls of employers, subject to the contribution requirements of the State law. Fluctuations in pay rolls from year to year preclude the computation of rates in such a manner as to yield an exact amount. Your committee believes that this new standard with respect to individual employer-experience rating is essential to protect the fundamental purposes of the Federal new standard with respect to individual employer-experience rating is essential to protect the fundamental purposes of the Federal tax credit system for providing unemployment compensation. Because it is an additional standard, State laws under which particular types of funds are maintained will be required to comply with this over-all standard as well as the applicable standards prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), or (4) of this subsection. The effective date of this new standard is postponed, under section 610 (b) of the bill with respect to the standards prescribed in paragraphs (2) and (4), to permit States to conform therewith without incurring the expense of special legislative sessions (sec. 610 (b) infra).

Paragraph (2) incorporates the standards of existing law applicable to a pooled fund or partially pooled account, except that the phrase "years of compensation experience" in the present law has phrase "years of compensation experience" in the present law has been replaced by a broader phrase permitting the use of an employer's "experience with respect to unemployment" or an employer's experience with respect to "other factors bearing a direct relation to unemployment risk" as a basis for individual-experience rating under a pooled fund. This change is made in order to extend the possible bases by which State laws may measure eligibility for reductions in employers' rates of contributions to a pooled fund, thus adding flexibility to the present law. Because of this change, the definition of the phrase "year of compensation experience" in subsection (d) (old subsection (c)) of this section is no longer necessary. is no longer necessary.

Paragraphs (3), (4), and (5): The reserve requirements with respect to reserve accounts (under the amended new paragraph (4) to become effective January 1, 1942) and guaranteed employment accounts have been restated in terms of 2½ percent of the pay roll for 3 years, rather than 7½ percent of the pay roll for 1 year. The term "pay roll" includes only the pay roll subject to the contribution requirements of the State law. This basis of measuring an employer's reserve or guaranteed employment account is more equitable from both the point of view of the employer and the State, since it permits the averaging of pay-roll experience over 3 years and avoids the unreasonable fluctuations in rates which may occur if pay rolls are substantially increased experience over 3 years and avoids the unreasonable fluctuations in rates which may occur if pay rolls are substantially increased or decreased for a particular year. Because the standard rate of contributions under most laws is 2.7 percent (a very few State laws require a standard rate of 3 percent), employers could not accumulate a reserve equal to $7\frac{1}{2}$ percent of their annual pay roll in less than 3 years, except in very unusual situations. Hence, it is believed that the change in the reserve requirement to $2\frac{1}{2}$ percent of pay rolls for 3 years in place of $7\frac{1}{2}$ percent of pay roll for 1 year will not, in practical effect, alter the present reserve requirements. The additional requirement with respect to 3 years of contributions is deemed necessary to clarify the provision rerequirements. The additional requirement with respect to 3 years of contributions is deemed necessary to clarify the provision relating to reserves equal to 2½ percent of the pay roll for 3 years. Unless the employer has actually been subject to the contribution requirements of the State law for 3 years, the provision measuring the reserve in terms of 2½ percent of pay rolls for the 3 preceding years would operate to reduce the reserve requirements. Under these two paragraphs, an employer may not be permitted a reduced rate of contributions to his guaranteed employment account unless he has fulfilled his guaranty with respect to the account unless he has fulfilled his guaranty with respect to the preceding year, and an employer may not be permitted a reduced rate of contributions to his reserve account unless compensation has been payable from his account throughout the preceding year.

Paragraph (5) incorporates the new standards with respect to individual reserve accounts. In order to permit States maintaining such accounts to conform therewith without incurring the expense of special legislative sessions, these new standards will not become effective until January 1, 1942. Prior to that date, the standards in paragraph (4), which incorporate the present law, will be applicable.

Other State standards

Section 1602 (b): This is a new subsection providing greater flexibility to the States with respect to the allowance of reduced rates of contributions on the basis of which additional credits against the Federal tax will be allowed. Without regard to this against the rederal tax will be allowed. Without regard to this subsection a State may allow reduced rates under individual employer experience rating systems in conformity with the standards in subsection (a) of this section. In addition, under the option provided by this subsection, a State may adopt either of two alternative courses of action if it meets the standards set forth in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection: (1) It may reduce all employers' rates uniformly; or (2) it may vary individual employers' rates of contributions under experience-rating provisions which comply with the applicable standards in paragraph (2) or (3) or (4) of subsection (a) (par. (3) of this subsection) but without so calculating the respective rates as to secure an annual yield of an amount substantially equivalent to 2.7 percent of the State pay roll, the requirement of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of this section.

The two standards contained in this subsection relate to the amount in the State unemployment compensation fund as of the computation date and the compensation payable under the State law as of the date the reduced rate is effective.

law as of the date the reduced rate is effective.

Under paragraph (1) the amount in the State fund, as of the date that amount is determined, must at least equal one and one-half times the highest amount paid into such fund up to some date prior to the effective date of the new rate with respect to any one of the 10 preceding calendar years, or one and one-half times the highest amount of compensation paid out of such fund within any one of the 10 preceding calendar years, whichever amount is greater. This paragraph does not require that either contributions or compensation shall have been payable under the State law for 10 calendar years.

Under paragraph (2) the State law must provide for the payment of compensation to otherwise eligible individuals in accordance with the following general standards or in accordance with general standards which are substantially equivalent thereto:

(A) Within a compensation period of not more than 52 consecutive weeks any such individual will be entitled to receive a total amount of compensation equal to not less than (1) 16 times total amount of compensation equal to not less than (i) 16 times his weekly rate of compensation for a week of total unemploy-ment, or (ii) one-third of the individual's total earnings for in-sured work during a base period of not less than 52 weeks, whichever is less:

(B) The waiting period with respect to each compensation period described under clause (A) may not exceed 2 calendar weeks of total unemployment or two periods of total unemployment of 7 consecutive days each. Such weekly or 7-day waiting periods need not be consecutive. This section is not applicable to periods for which an individual may be disqualified for compensation;

compensation;

(C) The weekly rates of compensation for total unemployment will be related to the individual's full-time weekly earnings for insured work during a period to be prescribed in the State law. Such a period may be a single week, representative of the individual's customary full-time weekly earnings, may be several such a company within a longer prescribed period. representative weeks occurring within a longer prescribed period, or the State law may secure such a relation to such full-time weekly earnings by formulae (such as a reasonable fraction of total wages for insured work during that calendar quarter in the individual's base period in which such wages were highest) which will produce a reasonable approximation of such full-time weekly earnings. Such weekly rates of compensation may not be less than: (i) $5 per week if such full-time weekly earnings were $10 or less; (ii) 50 percent of such earnings if they were more than $10 but not more than $30; and (iii) $15 per week if such earnings than $10 but not more than $30; and (iii) $15 per week if such earnings if they were more than $10 but not more than $30; and (iii) $15 per week if such earnings in the s ings were more than $30; and (iii) $15 per week it such earnings were more than $30; and (D) Compensation will be paid to an otherwise eligible individual who, by reason of some involuntary unemployment during a week, earns less than his weekly rate of compensation. The amount of such compensation will at least equal the difference between the individual's weekly rate of compensation for total unemployment and his actual earnings for such week.

Certification by the Board with respect to additional credit allowance

Section 1602 (c): This is a new subsection, requiring the Social Security Board to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, in the same manner as it certifies State laws under section 1603 (c), State laws which it finds comply with the requirements of subsection (a) or (b) of this section. Provision is made for partial certification where two kinds of funds are maintained under the same State law, one of which fails to comply with subsection (a) or (b) of this section, or where a contribution is divided between two kinds of funds under section (c) that the section is divided between two kinds of funds under a State law, so that additional credits will be allowed only with respect to reduced rates allowed in compliance with the requirements of this section.

Under these provisions a State law which complies in all respects with the requirements of this section will receive an unqualified certification. In some States, provision is made for the maintenance of two parallel systems (such as a reserve account system and a guaranteed employment account system). In such States, some employers may be covered by the one system and other some employers may be covered by the one system and other employers may be covered by the other. In such States there would be no difficulty in certifying one system, even though the other failed to comply with the requirements of this section, and the Board would accordingly be directed to do so by subsection (c) (2). In other States, contributions with respect to particular wage payments are required to be divided between two kinds of funds (such as the requirement that a part of each employer's contribution be credited to his own reserve account and a part to a "partially pooled" fund which is operated as a reinsurance fund). If in this type of situation the provisions of the State law with respect to one or the other such fund do not comply with the requirements of this section, the Board is directed to make such certification as will permit the allowance of additional credits only with respect to those reduced rates which have been allowed in accordance with the requirements of this section.

In addition, this new subsection includes a paragraph requiring the Social Security Board to advise the States, in the same manner as it advises the States of its findings under section 1603, whether as it advises the States of its findings under section 1603, whether or not their laws comply with the requirements of this section; after or not their laws comply with the requirements of this section; after finding such compliance, the Board may thereafter deny certification of a State law for additional credit purposes only after prior notice and opportunity for hearing to the State, and only if it finds the State law no longer contains the applicable provisions specified in subsection (a) or (b) or the State has failed to comply substantially with any such provision. The present subsection (b) of this section is eliminated because its purpose is achieved by the foregoing provisions. foregoing provisions.

Definitions

Section 1602 (d): Paragraphs (1) and (4) of this subsection are amended to make clear that from a particular employer's reserve account or guaranteed employment account all compensation payable on the basis of services performed for him and only compensation payable on the basis of services performed for him is to be paid. This incorporates in part the exception clause in the present definition of a pooled fund, i. e., that compensation may not be paid from a partial pool or reinsurance fund unless the reserve account or guaranteed employment account of the employer on the basis of whose services the benefit claimant had earned his benefit basis of whose services the benefit claimant had earned his benefit rights is exhausted or terminated.

The present paragraph (2) is revised and divided into paragraphs (2) and (3) in order to distinguish more clearly between a fully pooled fund and a partially pooled (or reinsurance) fund. The new paragraph (3) permits the maintenance of a partially pooled fund in connection with a guaranteed employment account, as well as in connection with a separate reserve account. The definition of the partially pooled account also makes clear that a State may, without endangering its compliance with the definitions of the term "reserve account" and "guaranteed employment account," provide for transfers from reserve accounts or guaranteed employment accounts to a partially pooled account. Several State laws now provide for such transfers.

Paragraph (4) (old paragraph (3)) amends the present law to permit guarantees of employment to be operative only with respect to individuals who continue to be available for suitable work in the guaranteed establishment. This provision is deemed necessary because under the present provision it is not clear whether sary because under the present provision it is not clear whether employers are relieved from their guarantees with respect to individuals who quit voluntarily, or are unable to work because of some incapacity, or are out on strike, etc. This paragraph is also amended to make clear the general understanding with respect to its requirements concerning the probationary service period, i. e., that the probationary period must be served within a continuous period immediately following the employee's first week of service and may not be claimed repeatedly with respect to intermittent periods of employment which never exceed 12 consecutive weeks. The last clause of this definition is amended to clarify the point that guaranteed remuneration and unemployment, compensation are that guaranteed remuneration and unemployment compensation are not the same, and that the guaranteed remuneration is not to be payable out of the guaranteed employment account.

Paragraph (5) (old par. (4)) deletes the definition of the term "year of compensation experience," because that term is no longer used in paragraph (2) (old par. (1)) of section 1602 (a). The definition of the term "year" in this paragraph is designed to permit States to allow reduced rates on the basis of 12 consecutive months, as well as on the basis of a calendar year.

Paragraph (6), defining the term "balance," is a new definition added to make clear that the amount of the reserve required to be accumulated by employers with respect to whom a reserve account or a guaranteed employment account is maintained, is to be made up of payments by such employers and may not be made up of employee contributions or funds from other sources. If employee contributions are required under a State law which provides for the maintenance of reserve accounts or guaranteed employment than the recent payments and the requirements. funds, such contributions may be payable into the reinsurance fund. The exception contained in this definition, which permits the inclusion within a "balance" of payments other than payments by employers if made to a reserve account or guaranteed employ-ment account prior to January 2, 1939, is designed to relieve the States of complicated computations where payments, other than payments by employers, have been paid to such accounts during early months of the State's experience.

Paragraph (7) defines the term "computation date" to include any date occurring within 27 weeks prior to the date that a reduced rate goes into effect. As above indicated, this provision is designed to give the States ample time within which to make their computations with respect to variations in rates of contributions. Such computations are to be made at least once in each calendar

Paragraph (8), defining the term "reduced rate," is designed to make clear that the requirements of subsections (a) and (b) are not applicable to a reduction from an increased rate to a standard rate, i. e., situations in which employers with bad employment experience have been required to pay increased rates and are sub-sequently permitted to pay the standard or normal rate.

Section 610 (b): This subsection of the bill, referred to in connection with section 1602 (a) (1) of the Internal Revenue Code, is necessary in order to permit employers who are allowed reduced rates of contributions under State laws which conform with the present standards, to secure additional credits on the basis thereof and to avoid requiring States to convene special sessions of their legislatures in order to conform their laws with the new standard in section 1602 (a) (1) of the code. This section of the bill postpones the application of that new standard with respect to pooled funds, partially pooled accounts, and individual reserve accounts, until January 1, 1942, thereby allowing ample time for all States to enact necessary amendatory legislation at the next regular sessions of their respective legislatures. sessions of their respective legislatures.

Section 611: The changes made in paragraphs (1), (3), and (4) of section 1603 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 903 (a) of the Social Security Act) by this section correspond to those made in paragraphs (2), (4), and (5) of section 303 (a) of the Social Security Act by section 302, supra.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING TAX RETURNS UNDER SUBCHAPTER C OF CHAPTER 9 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

. Section 612: This section amends section 1604 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code to authorize a longer extension of time for filing the return of the Federal unemployment tax. Existing law permits an extension of as much as 60 days. The amendment would provide an additional 30 days, or 90 days in all. The extensions under section 1604 (b) are granted under rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. An employer finding it impossible to make his return on January 31, the due date prescribed in section 1604 (a), or to pay his State contributions by that date, may make application in accordance with such rules and regulations for an application in accordance with such rules and regulations for an extension of time for filing his Federal return. If granted, the employer has until the extended due date, as granted, to make his return and pay his State contributions. No delinquency penalty will be incurred for late filing and no loss of credits will be suffered if the return is filed, and the contributions paid to the State, on or before such extended due date.

INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN COMMERCE AND FEDERAL INSTRUMENTALITIES Section 613: This section designates existing section 1606 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 906 of the Social Security Act) as subsection (a). A clarifying amendment to the provision makes it clear beyond any possible doubt that an employer engaged in foreign commerce is on the same basis as respects authority of a State to require payments into an unemployment fund as employers engaged in interstate commerce.

This section also amends section 1606 by adding subsections (b) and (c), relating to Federal instrumentalities, and (d), relating to employment on lands held by the Government.

Subsection (b) confers on State legislatures authority to require instrumentalities of the United States (except those wholly owned by the United States or exempt from the taxes imposed by secs. 1410 and 1600 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly secs. 804 and 901, respectively of the Social Security Act) by any other provision of law) to comply with State unemployment compensation laws. Under this amendment the States would be able to cover under their unemployment compensation systems patiently backs and certainty. Under this amendment the States would be able to cover under their unemployment compensation systems national banks and certain other Federal instrumentalities. Protection against any possible discrimination against instrumentalities of the United States is afforded by the two provisos, which make the permission to require compliance with the State law conditional upon equality of treatment and upon the approval and certification of the State law under section 1603 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 903 of the State) Sected Secretify Action of the Social Security Act).

Subsection (c) makes provision for examination by the Comptroller of the Currency of returns and reports made to the States by national banks.

Subsection (d) authorizes the States to cover under their unemployment compensation laws services performed upon land held by the Federal Government, such as services for hotels located in national parks. DEFINITIONS

Section 614: This section, effective January 1, 1940, amends section 1607 of the Internal Revenue Code, containing definitions applicable in the case of the Federal unemployment tax.

Definition of employer

Section 1607 (a): No change from existing law is made in this definition.

Definition of wages

Section 1607 (b): This subsection continues the present definition of wages, but excludes certain payments heretofore included. Paragraph (1) excludes that part of the remuneration which, after remuneration equal to $3,000 has been paid to an individual by an employer with respect to employment during any calendar year, is paid to such individual by such employer with respect to employment during such calendar year. Paragraph (2) excludes all payments made by the employer to or on behalf of an employee or former employee, under a plan or system providing for retirement benefits (including pensions) or disability benefits (including medical and hospitalization expenses), but not life insurance. These payments will be excluded even though the amount or possibility of such payments is taken into consideration in fixing the amount of remuneration and even though such payments are required, either expressly or impliedly, by the contract of employment. Since it is the practice of some employers to provide for such payments through insurance or the establishment and maintenance of funds for the purpose, the premiums or insurance payments and the payments made into or out of any fund will likewise be excluded from wages. Paragraph (3) expressly excludes from wages the payment by an employer (without deduction from the remuneration of or other reimbursement from the employee) of the employee's tax imposed by section 1400 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 801 of Social Security Act) and employee contributions under State unemployment compensation laws. Paragraph (4) excludes dismissal payments which the employer is not legally obligated to make.

Definition of employment

Section 1607 (c): The amendments made here conform this defi-nition to the definitions contained in amended section 209 (b) of the Social Security Act and amended section 1426 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 811 (b) of the Social Security Act) with the exception of maritime service.

with the exception of maritime service.

The definition of the term "employment" under the amendment as applied to service rendered prior to January 1, 1940, retains the exemptions contained in the present law. The definition applicable to service rendered on and after that date continues unchanged some of the present exemptions, revises others, and adds certain additional ones. No substantive change in existing law is effected by the introductory paragraph of the definition.

Paragraph (1) continues the exception of agricultural labor, but a new subsection (1) defines the term for purposes of the exclusion.

Paragraph (1) continues the exception of agricultural fabor, but a new subsection (1) defines the term for purposes of the exclusion.

Paragraph (2) continues the present exception of domestic service in a private home, but adds to the exception such service in a local college club or local chapter of a college fraternity or sorority (not including alumni clubs or chapters). Thus services of cook, waiter, chambermaid, and the housemother, performed for these local clubs and chapters, are exempt.

Paragraph (2) code or extensive of course labor, not in the Paragraph (3) adds an exception of casual labor not in the course of the employer's trade or business. This exception is already contained in amended section 209 (b) of the Social Security Act and amended section 1426 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Paragraph (4) continues the existing exception of service performed as an officer or member of the crew of a vessel on the navigable waters of the United States.

Paragraph (5) continues the existing exception of service performed by an individual in the employ of his son, daughter, or spouse, and service performed by a child under the age of 21 in the employ of his father or mother.

In the employ of his father or mother.

Paragraph (6) continues the exemption of service performed in the employ of the United States, but with respect to instrumentalities of the United States, limits the exemption to those instrumentalities which are (A) wholly owned by the United States or (B) exempt from the tax imposed by section 1600 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 901 of the Social Security Act) by virtue of any other provision of law. The change in this provision brings within the unemployment tax provisions certain Federal instrumentalities not falling within clause (A) or (B) above, such as national banks. such as national banks.

Paragraph (7) continues the exemption of service for State governments, their subdivisions and instrumentalities, but limits the exemption with respect to instrumentalities so that it applies only to an instrumentality which is wholly owned by a State or political subdivision or which would be immune from the tax imposed by section 1600 of the Internal Revenue Code (formerly sec. 901 of the Social Security Act) by the Constitution. The amendment thus narrows the present exemption and in no case broadens it.

Paragraph (9) excepts services of employees covered by the railroad unemployment insurance system. This provision leaves unchanged the exemption of the service of an individual in the employ of an employer subject to such system even though the individual receives remuneration in a form (e.g., tips) not reognized as compensation under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, and leaves unchanged the inclusion of service in case it is performed by an employee in the segregable nonrailroad activities of an employer where segregation of the railroad activities from nonrailroad activities is found necessary in the interpretation and administration of the laws relating to the social security system and the railroad unemployment insurance system. Paragraphs (10) to (13), inclusive, are identical with the same

Paragraphs (10) to (13), inclusive, are identical with the same paragraphs in section 209 (b) of the Social Security Act. For paragraphs in section 209 (b) of the Social Security Act. For detailed analysis of such paragraphs see pp. 47-49 of this report. Section 1607 (d): This section relates to an employee who has both included and excluded service for the same employer during a pay period. It provides that if one-half or more of the services constitutes included employment, all of such service will be included; but that if less than one-half constitutes included employment, all will be excluded. The provision does not apply to the service of an employee in a pay period if any of the service of the employee in the pay period is covered under the railroad unemployment-insurance system.

Section 1607 (e), defining "State agency," makes no change in the existing definition of that term

Definition of unemployment fund

Section 1607 (f): This definition is amended by adding two new sentences. The first of these added sentences is a clarifying amendment providing that all sums standing to the credit of the State in the (Federal) unemployment-trust fund and money withdrawn from that fund by the State but unexpended shall constitute a part of the State fund. This removes any possible doubt whether such moneys remain a part of the State fund. The second added sentence provides that an unemployment fund shall be deemed to be maintained during a tayable year only if no part be deemed to be maintained during a taxable year only if no part of the moneys of such fund was expended for purposes other than payment of unemployment compensation and refunds of sums payment to the provision and retunds of stime erroneously paid into the fund. This provision, in conjunction with an amendment to section 1601 (a) (see supra, sec. 609), makes it clear that an employer is entitled to credit against the Federal tax only so long as the State uses its fund for a proper purpose.

Definition of contributions

Section 1607 (g): This provision is changed so as to avoid use of defined terms and thus to include in the term "contributions" payments required by a State law with respect to services not covered by the Federal law.

Definition of compensation

Section 1607 (h): No change in existing law is made in this definition.

Definition of employee

Section 1607 (i): The term "employee" is defined as in existing law to include an officer of a corporation. Although the term is not broadened with respect to salesmen as was done in the definition for purposes of old-age insurance coverage, the tests for determining the employer-employee relationship laid down in cases relating to tort liability and to the common-law concept of cases relating to tort liability and to the common-law concept of master and servant should not be narrowly applied.

By the amendment to subsection (c), contained in paragraph (10) (A) thereof, uncompensated officers of any organization exempt from income tax under section 101 of the Internal Revenue Code are excluded from the count in determining whether the organization is an employer of eight or more and liable for the tax. However, uncompensated officers of corporations not so exempt are not excluded for purposes of such determination merely because they are uncompensated.

Section 1607 (j) and (k), defining the terms "State" and "person," respectively, make no change in the existing definitions of those terms.

Definition of agricultural labor

Section 1607 (1) is identical with section 209 (1) of the Social Security Act. For detailed analysis of such section see page 51 of Section 615: This section inserts a new section in subchapter C of chapter 9 of the Internal Revenue Code which provides that the subchapter may be cited as the "Federal Unemployment Tax Act."

TITLE VII-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE X OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT CHANGE IN REQUIREMENTS FOR STATE PLANS FOR AID TO THE BLIND

Section 701: This section amends section 1002 (a) of the Social Security Act. Section 1002 (a) sets out certain basic requirements which a State plan for aid to the blind must meet in order to be approved by the Social Security Board.

Section 701 (a) amends clause (5) so as to make it clear that the methods of administration of the State plan must be proper as well as efficient.

the methods of administration of the State plan must be proper as well as efficient.

Section 701 (b) adds a new clause, numbered (8), which is effective July 1, 1941. Under this clause the State plan must provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any income and resources of an individual claiming aid to the blind. It also adds a new clause, numbered (9), effective July 1, 1941, which requires that the State plan must provide safeguards which restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of aid to the blind. These new provisions are similar to those added to title I of the Social Security Act by section 101 of the bill.

PAYMENT TO STATES FOR AID TO THE BLIND

Section 702: This section amends section 1003 of the Social Security Act.

Subsection (a) of section 1003 is amended so that its provisions will conform with section 1001 of the Social Security Act, which authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish finanwhich authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish financial assistance to needy individuals who are blind.

Subsection (b) (2) is amended so as to provide that the Board, in making grants to States, shall reduce the amount to be paid to any State for any quarter by a sum equivalent to the pro rata share to which the United States is equitably entitled, as determined by the Board, of the net amount recovered during any prior quarter by the State or any political subdivision thereof with respect to aid to the blind furnished under the State plan.

A proviso eliminates from consideration for the purpose of de-termining the amount of the offset any amount recovered from the estate of a deceased recipient which is not in excess of the amount expended by the State for the funeral expenses of such deceased recipient, in accordance with the State public-assistance law upon which the plan is based. The provision is a new one and is similar in scope and operation to the one included by section 102 of the bill in section 3 (b) (2) of title I of the Social Security Act.

Section 703: This section amends section 1006 so as to conform its provisions with section 1001 of the Social Security Act, which authorizes appropriations to enable States to furnish financial assistance to blind individuals who are needy.

TITLE VIII-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE XI OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT DEFINITION OF EMPLOYEE AND OF EMPLOYER

Section 801: Subsection (a) amends the definition of "State" contained in section 1101 (a) of the Social Security Act so as to include Puerto Rico for the purposes of titles V and VI of such act. Subsection (b) amends paragraph (6) of such section 1101 (a) by inserting two new definitions which are applicable to title II of Inserting two new definitions which are applicable to title 11 of the act.

Identical definitions appear in the amendments to section 1426 of the Federal Insurance Contributions Act.

The amendments to the definition of employee relate to salesmen. In some instances where remuneration is by way of commission and the services are performed away from the place of business of the person for whom they are performed, the individual performing the services is held to be an employee, while in others he is held not to be an employee. to be an employee.

A restricted view of the employer-employee relationship should not be taken in the administration of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system in making coverage determinations. The tests for determining the relationship laid down in cases relating to tort liability and to the common-law concept of master and servant should not be narrowly applied. In certain cases even the most liberal view as to the existence of the employer-employee relationship will fall short of covering individuals who should be covered, for example, certain classes of salesmen.

In the case of salesmen, it is thought desirable to extend coverage even where all of the usual elements of the employer-employee relationship are wholly lacking and where accordingly even under the liberal application of the law the court would not ordinarily find the existence of the master-and-servant relationship. A restricted view of the employer-employee relationship should find the existence of the master-and-servant relationship.

It is the intention of this amendment to set up specific standards so that individuals performing services as salesmen may be uni-formly covered without the necessity of applying any of the usual tests as to the relationship of employer and employee.

A salesman in business as a broker or factor is excluded if the services are performed as part of such business, and, in furtherance of such business, similar services are performed for other persons and one or more employees of such salesman perform a substantial part of such services; and an individual whose services as a salesman are casual services, not in the course of such individual's principal trade, business, or occupation, is not included in the definition. This definition is not intended to affect the employer-employee status of a salesman and the employee of such salesman. Thus, the business chauffeur who has been an employee of a salesman. Thus, the business chauffeur who has been an employee of a salesman will remain solely the employee of such salesman.

The definition of employer is to follow the definition of employee. It is for the purpose of making clear that the extension of the broadened employee concept also broadens the employer concept. Thus, where a salesman is held to be an employee, the person for whom the salesman performs the services is the employer. For example, an insurance solicitor who executes a contract with an insurance company under which he performs services as a salesman would be the employee of the insurance company and not the general agent of the company.

PENALTY SECTIONS

Section 802: This section amends title XI of the Social Security Act by adding the following two sections:

Disclosure of information in possession of Board.

Section 1106: This section prohibits the disclosure, except pursuant to Board regulations, of any returns or statements filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under title VIII of the Social Security Act or the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, or regulations thereunder, which have been transmitted by the Commissioner to the Board. The prohibition against disclosure, except pursuant to Board regulations also extends to any file recent pursuant to Board regulations, also extends to any file, record, report, paper, or information obtained by the Board or any of its officers or employees in the course of official duties, and any such material obtained by any person from the Board or any of its officers or employees. Violation of the prohibition is punishable as a misdemeanor.

Penalty for fraud and misuse of Board's name

Penalty for fraud and misuse of Board's name

Section 1107 (a) provides that anyone who makes any false representation, with intent to defraud any person, knowing the representation to be false, concerning the requirements of this act, or the Federal Insurance Contributions Act, or the Federal Unemployment Tax Act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Section 1107 (b) provides that anyone who, with intent to obtain information as to the date of birth, employment, wages, or benefits of any individual, falsely represents to the Board that he is such individual or the wife, parent, or child of such individual, or such individual's agent, or the agent of such wife, parent, or child, or falsely represents to any person that he is an employee or agent of the United States, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

TITLE IX-MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Section 901: This section makes clear that the amendment of Section 901: This section makes clear that the amendment of title III of the Social Security Act and section 1603 of the Internal Revenue Code shall not be construed to amend or alter those provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act which provide limited exceptions to the provisions of section 303 (a) (4) and (5) of the Social Security Act and 1603 (a) (3) and (4) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Section 902: Subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) substantially liberalize the conditions of allowance of credit against the Federal unemployment tax imposed by title IX of the Social Security Act for the years 1936, 1937, and 1938. Your committee recognizes that the periodical granting of relief after the close of the taxable year affected would destroy the effectiveness of the conditions of allowance of the credit provided in permanent law and would prove costly in that it would call for the reopening and reconsideration of cases previously closed, the adjustment of claims, the abatement of assessments, and the payment of refunds. However, the need should not arise in the future for granting relief of the type provided in the present section, since substantial liberalization for 1939 and subsequent years is provided in section 609 of the bill, amending section 1601 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code.

Subsection (a) provides for the allowance of credit against the tax for 1936, 1937, or 1938, for contributions paid to the State for such year before the sixtleth day after the date of enactment of this act. Under section 810 of the Revenue Act of 1938 taxpayers were allowed credit against the tax for 1936 for contributions paid before July 27, 1938. Since a few taxpayers did not take advantage of that relief provision, it is felt desirable to include credit against the tax for 1936 in the present provisions. Thus, the same final date for paying contributions to the State, in order to secure credit against the tax—namely, the fifty-ninth day after the date of enactment of this act—is provided for the fax for each o tax for each of the 3 past years during which the tax has been in effect.

Under clause (2) of subsection (a) credit is allowable for contributions paid on or after the sixtieth day after the date of enactment of this act with respect to wages paid after the fortieth day after such date of enactment. This is designed to permit credit in cases in which, because the "wages payable" basis of the tax for the years 1936, 1937, and 1938 is still retained, credit would otherwise be lost since some wages are still being paid with respect to those years, and it may not be possible to estimate the amount thereof or the amount thereof may have been underestimated. been underestimated.

Clause (3) of subsection (a) permits credit for contributions paid to the State, without regard to the date of payment, if the assets of the taxpayer are in the custody or control of a fiduciary appointed by, or under the control of, a court of competent jurisdiction at any time during the 59-day period following the date

Subsection (b) of this section makes the same provision with respect to the taxable years 1936, 1937, and 1938 as are made in section 1601 (a) (4) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, for the taxable year 1939 and thereafter for cases in which the taxpayer pays his contributions to the wrong State. (See sec. 609, supra.)
Subsection (c) preserves the definitions of section 907 of the Subsection (c) preserves the definitions of section 907 of the Social Security Act, the 90-percent maximum credit against the Federal tax, and other provisions of title IX of the Social Security Act, essential to the operation of the relief provisions in subsections (a), (b), and (h) of this section for the taxable years 1936, 1937, and 1938.

Subsection (d) provides for refund of any tax (including penalties and interest) which has been collected but with respect to which credit is allowable under this section. The law (including statutes of limitations) applicable in the case of erroneous cr illegal collection of tax will apply to such refunds. No interest will be paid on any such refund.

will be paid on any such refund.

Subsection (e) of this section is designed to permit credit against the tax for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942 if in those years wages are paid for services rendered after December 31, 1938, but during a year prior to that in which payment occurs, and contributions with respect to such wages have not been credited against the tax for any prior taxable year. This provision relieves cases of hardship which might arise by reason of the change in the basis of the Federal tax from "wages payable" to "wages paid." (See sec. 608, supra.)

Subsection (f) is designed to make retroactive to the date of enactment of the Social Security Act the exemptions from Federal enactment of the Social Security Act the exemptions from Federal enactment of the Social Security Act the exemptions from Federal insurance and unemployment compensation coverage contained, respectively, in amended sections 209 (b) (11) and (12) of the Social Security Act and amended sections 1426 (b) (11) and (12) and 1607 (c) (11) and (12) of the Internal Revenue Code of service in the employ of foreign governments and certain of their instrumentalities. If any tax (including interest and penalties) has been collected with respect to service thus exempt, it is to be refunded, without allowance of interest, in accordance with the provisions of law (including statutes of limitations) applicable in the case of erroneous or illegal collection of the tax.

Subsection (a) provides that no lump-sum payments shall be Subsection (g) provides that no lump-sum payments shall be made under the provisions of section 204 of the Social Security Act after the date of the enactment of this bill, except to the estate of an individual who dies prior to January 1, 1940.

Subsection (h) grants relief to taxpayers as well as States in cases in which the highest court of a State has held contributions paid under the State law with respect to the taxable years 1936 or 1937 not to have been required payments under the State law. For example, certain States enacted their unemployment-compensation laws during the latter portion of 1936, levying contributions thereunder retroactively with respect to services performed on and after January 1 of that year. State taxpayers in good faith paid such contributions and claimed and received credit therefor against their Federal tax. If sometime later the retroactive imposition of such contributions is held by the highest court of such State to have been invalid, such taxpayers may be entitled to refunds under the State law, but by virtue of that fact such taxpayers also become liable for the full Federal tax with respect to such year.

Under this subsection so much of any such payments as are not refunded to the taxpayer may be credited against the tax imposed by section 901 of the Social Security Act for the calendar year 1936 or 1937. Moreover, if, in the example cited, the State had paid benefits with respect to unemployment occurring during 1938, this section

1937. Moreover, if, in the example cited, the State had paid benefits with respect to unemployment occurring during 1938, this section safeguards the status of the State law under section 903 of the Social Security Act by providing that so much of such payments as are not returned to the taxpayer shall be considered "contributions" for the purposes of that section. This section also postpones the periods of limitations prescribed by section 3312 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code in the case of the tax for 1936 or 1937 of any such taxpayer to whom any such payment is returned, until the last such payment is returned to the taxpayer.

Section 903: This section amends section 1430 of the Internal Revenue Code by striking out the reference therein to section 3762 of the code and inserting in lieu thereof a reference to section 3661. The change merely corrects a typographical error made in section 1430 when the code was enacted.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1939

(Legislative day of Monday, June 5, 1939)

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Great is Thy name, O Lord, marvelous are Thy works, the whole earth is full of Thy glory.

Open our hearts, we beseech Thee, this day to the joy of life, to the exquisite loveliness that lurks in leaf and flower, to the haunting beauty framed in the faces of innocent children, and to the sacramental gifts of friendship that somehow by Thy touch of love our associations here may feel the impulse of this note of gladness to the solution of the problems which we share. Keep us ever close to Thee, and as we grow in age may we grow in grace, that the twilight of indifference may be changed into a fervent yearning for what is true, noble, and holy, and a bitter loathing for all things false, selfish, and vile. We ask these blessings not only for ourselves but for Thy children everywhere, that a regenerated people may speed the day when the kingdoms of this world shall have become the kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ and He shall reign forever and ever. Amen.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR COPELAND, OF NEW YORK

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, recently I prepared an address which I expected to deliver when the memorial addresses were made in the Senate a few days ago on the life, character, and public service of the late Senator from New York, Hon. Royal S. Copeland. However, I was unavoidably detained from the Senate on that occasion, and I now ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Record the remarks prepared by me as a tribute to the late Senator.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in tribute to Senator Royal S. Copeland, who, in a life of public service, represented the State of New York for 15 years in the Senate.

Before being elected to that office he had gained distinction as a physician. The human sympathy and the understanding of men necessary to the physician, and the industry and determination of the legislator were so merged as to make him, with his pleasant disposition, a valued friend.

He was by nature human, friendly, and simple, admirably equipped to be a family counselor. He was well able to meet the larger responsibilities that came to him when he was made health commissioner of New York City, and later, when he represented his State in the Senate. He never ceased to be concerned for the health of those about him. Time and again he admonished individual Senators and the Senate collectively against overwork. He, in his zeal for accomplishment, did not spare himself when his own health was not robust.

In the later years of Senator Copeland's life several items of legislation in which we were both closely interested brought us together. I learned how painstaking he really was, what patience he brought to a task, and how willing he was to study details. He was a stubborn fighter and persistent in his advocacy, but he knew how and when to compromise on matters which he did not regard as vital to his main objective. The task of a Senator from New York is, by its nature, a heavy one. Senator Copeland also bore the burden of the chairmanship of one of the most important Senate committees. The weight of his own duties made him no less willing to champion the issues sponsored by his colleagues.

His knowledge of life and his wide experience gave the touch of humanity to what he said. He had, as he told the Senate, seen young men and women marry, he had watched them establish homes, make gradual improvements on the property, build extensions as children came, and plant the trees and shrubs that would help make the home place the center of a family's life. Such things as these were in the background of his thinking on legislation. He realized the importance of the primary things. Knowing and loving a way of life, he fought for what he thought sustained it.

Senator COPELAND was not a lawyer, but when grave constitutional questions confronted the Congress his knowledge of men and his understanding of American institutions gave him what he needed to know.

Where did he learn these fundamentals? The outlines of his career suggest the answer, but they do not tell the full story. We see him as a patriotic citizen, participating in the public life of his country, serving successively as mayor, as president of the board of education and president of the park commissioners of Ann Arbor, Mich., and later in New York as a member of the city ambulance board and as health commissioner, before being elected to the Senate.

The recital of offices held and responsibilities fulfilled indicates his record as an official and as a citizen. It does not explain the man's deep-seated tolerance, nor the broadness of his vision. It does not explain why Senator COPELAND, an active and prominent adherent of one religious faith, stood fast to defend the rights of others to worship in accordance with the dictates of conscience.

He himself told us more. Addressing the Senate, he was able to review incidents of his career and to declare without fear: "Let no man say I am a convert to tolerance." As he went on there emerged the picture of him as a boy and young man, instructed by his father in respect for the beliefs of others. Then, while a young physician, he observed the attacks being made by an un-American organization on those professing a particular religious belief. It did not matter to him that he was not the object of the attack. He denounced the organization; he sponsored public meetings in opposition to it, for, as he said:

The political activities of that organization and its acts of oppression, discrimination, and social indecency caused indignation in my soul because of the spirit of tolerance given me by my father.

The attitude of mind that he showed then entered into what he was to do later. He brought the same spirit with him to the Senate. It was apparent in his personal dealings with his fellow Senators; it was a part of his approach to public questions. Born and taught to respect the ideas and opinions of others, his life as an individual and as a public servant was free of hatred and prejudice. It was this spirit that ran throughout the performance of all his work that gave warmth to the friendship we had for him when he walked among us and gave us cause to revere his memory today and always.

ERADICATION OF GRASSHOPPERS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, an emergency of large proportions is confronting a number of States of the Northwest. It will be recalled by every Member of the Senate that during the past 2 years there have been requests for appropriations for the eradication of grasshoppers. At the beginning of this year the Bureau of Entomology, feeling that the threat was unusually great, indicated what would be the need if the grasshopper eradication work were to be carried on to the degree they thought necessary. Their request was for something more than $5,000,000.

In the first deficiency bill the Congress allowed a total of $3,000,000 for this purpose. It soon developed that that was not nearly adequate, and the Senate wrote into the regular appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department an additional sum in the amount of $2,417,000. That bill is tied up in conference at the present time, and, perhaps, will remain in conference for a matter of a week and probably 2 weeks. In any event, we are confronted now with the fact that the moneys which have been appropriated and which are so essential at this particular time will be exhausted by June 10.

The threat and danger are much greater than in any preceding year. A desperate effort is being made to cope with the situation that presents itself. The conferees of the House and of the Senate, dealing this morning with the agricultural appropriation bill, were consulted, and there was general agreement that there was no hope that the conference could be concluded and action taken on the regular appropriation bill anywhere near June 10. It is my best advice that the Senate should start a proceeding whereby this particular amount of money might be secured separately and with speed. So I am introducing a joint resolution providing for the appropriation of the $2,417,000. The full Committee on Appropriations of the Senate is meeting this afternoon. I shall try to win consideration of that committee for this measure and expedite it so far as it is possible, if only the Senate will cooperate to the extent asked. I send the joint resolution to the desk and request that it may be referred at once to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 149) making an appropriation for the control of outbreaks, of insect pests was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

HOUSING ACT OF 1937-AMENDMENT

Mr. KING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States

Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOSPITALIZATION OF CERTAIN PERSONS OF THE UNITED STATES FORCES-AMENDMENTS

Mr. REYNOLDS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2304) to provide for hospitalization of certain persons who have served in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

STABILIZATION FUND AND WEIGHT OF THE DOLLAR—REPEAL OF SILVER PURCHASE ACT OF 1934—AMENDMENT

Mr. TOWNSEND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3325) to extend the time within which the powers relating to the stabilization fund and alteration of the weight of the dollar may be exercised, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to present for reference to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it made a public document, a manuscript containing a general description of The Army of the United States and its components, its arms, services, and bureaus, and its military and nonmilitary activities.

For years there has been a general demand for a publication of this character, and I believe it should be printed and distributed throughout the United States.

A similar pamphlet entitled "The United States Navy" was printed during the Seventy-fifth Congress, first session, Senate Document 35, and has been of general interest and great informative value.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the manuscript and accompanying material will be received and referred to the Committee on Printing.

FOREIGN POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I believe this Congress is to face a real test in the next few weeks on what shall be the foreign policy of the United States.

We are to be called upon to determine whether the Government of the United States shall attempt to remain neutral as regards Old World conflicts, or whether the Government of the United States is to be empowered, and thereby instructed, to throw its influence and resources in favor of certain nations, and against certain other nations, in the age-old game of power politics in Europe.

The campaign to authorize the President of the United States to participate in the preliminary war moves of European powers with whom the majority of the people of the United States are in sympathy, will, in my judgment, center on repeal of the arms embargo provisions of the present Neutrality Act.

I believe the embargo provisions should be retained by all means. Sales of arms and munitions of war are an open door to our own entry into any major European conflict.

I believe the majority of people in the Missouri-Mississippi Valley feel much the same as I do about it. I am confident that is the general sentiment in my State of Kansas, based on hundreds of petitions and many hundreds of letters I have received in the past months.

It is my opinion that Congress, instead of repealing the embargo provisions and thereby weakening the present Neutrality Act, should strengthen it by enacting something like the Nye-Bone-Clark bill. This plan will have my full support when this matter comes before the Senate.

I also intend to support and work for submission of the proposed war referendum amendment to the Constitution. I am thoroughly convinced that this proposed amendment. safeguarded as it is to give the President and the Congress full power to take whatever measures are necessary to defend the United States and all its Territories, and also to defend the Western Hemisphere against outside aggression, would be ratified by the people if submitted to them.

I do not intend to take the time of the Senate today to enter into a prolonged discussion of the subject of foreign relations, but simply want to make my position plain.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Sunflower Club of Larned, Kans., and a few short letters received by me from citizens of Kansas who are opposed to the repeal of the embargo.

There being no objection, the resolution and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

United States Senator, Washington, D. C.
DEAR SENATOR: Odd as it may seem, due to our previous experience, some of our leaders, high in governmental affairs, are actually ence, some of our leaders, high in governmental affairs, are actually fostering and propagating our intrusion in other countries' business. By so doing they are thereby helping to create another war where we surely under those conditions would become involved. Nations of the Old World have old and new accounts to settle among themselves, and it seems to me that fact is none of our business when they settle or how they settle. Of course, should they choose war it would be of some concern to us, due to our economic dislocation and other factors involved. Those facts of themselves are so insignificant for us in comparison with the cost themselves are so insignificant for us in comparison with the cost and monstrosity of a great war that the use of such argument should make anyone blush with shame.

Those countries over there, to whom we address our insolent invectives, undoubtedly resent our interference as we would resent theirs were we in the same position. The idea that we should have special privileges due to our greater investments is very unjust. It is a well-known fact that a shabby, small home to a poor man is just as dear a possession to him as is a large and beautiful mansion to a rich one—the former more so, for the very fact that he is poor, therefore suffering a sense of lack plus injury to his pride.

No! No! It cannot be any of our business!

No! No! It cannot be any of our business!

I therefore, considering the eminence of your position in the affairs of this great Republic, pray you, dear Senator, to utilize all of your outstanding influence to keep this Nation out of European or Asiatic entanglements. I feel sure you will thereby be contributing in a large measure, if not wholly, in preventing to our problements of the incurrence of the incurrenc people the inevitable catastrophic consequences of another war.

May God inspire you to take this course. Your devoted and humble servant, JOHN PETRUCCI United States Veteran of the World War.

Isn't it too bad that our country should be discussing whether or not we should enter the disgraceful quarrels of Europe? Every man, woman, and child before this should have risen above this state of mind. It isn't reasonable that our Congress should be wrangling over this matter. A friendly, legitimate trade with all countries alike. Why do we take sides and make enemies? Any of them are our friend only as they need us and their promise a piece of paper. After reflection, I am heartly ashamed of our part in the World War. England is at the bottom of most of it. "Propaganda" the curse of the world.

MARGARET GOSS.

DAWN, Mo.

ARTHUR CAPPER, Topeka, Kans.

DEAR SIR: I want to congratulate you on the work you are trying to do to keep us out of war.

It is heartbreaking to think of our boys giving their lives to make millionaires out of some big men. I think their money should be used as long as possible to save the lives of our young men. It is no wonder our generation of boys today are disheartened as I have heard several say.

If the boys could line the men up who are advocating war and shoot at them first, probably that would end this war.

Yours truly,

Mrs. W. T. SYKES.

SPIVEY, KANS., May 29, 1939.

Dear Mr. Capper: I, the mother of two grown sons, am yproud of our Nation for the stand for peace that is taken, but when I learn that we are furnishing Japan 54 percent of her war materials and buying 90 percent of her silk, I am heartsick and am sending my humble protest against it.

We are our brother's keeper, and, Mr. Capper, as Kansas Senator, will you please do all in your power to keep the United States from aiding any country to carry on war?

Respectfully yours,

Mrs. Harry Bertholf.

Mrs. HARRY BERTHOLF.

STUDLEY, KANS., May 23, 1939.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

Dear Sir: I don't really think it's necessary for me to send these petitions as you have enough backbone to support them whether the voters support you or not. But I believe this printed form lacks one thing and that is to support a good-neighbor policy, the lack of which I believe is the most fundamental cause of war there lack of which I believe is the most fundamental cause of war there is, except, of course, the personal ambition of certain individuals. Many countries, like Germany, have a very serious need for necessary articles. If we make a real effort to supply those needs in exchange for things we need, and make especial efforts to treat them as neighbors and not enemies, I think would help more than anything else to make permanent peace.

Had the Allies treated Germany at the close of the war 20 years ago as the North treated the South at the end of the Civil War I believe there would have been no more thought of war than there now is between the North and South.

But to follow this policy would mean sacrifice sometimes. We farmers might have to take less for goods we sell. Manufacturers might have to sell lower.

Hon. Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,

United States Senator from Kansas, Washington, D. C.
My Dear Senator: I heard with much interest and pride your remarks immediately after the Hitler broadcast. Practically every remarks immediately after the Hitler broadcast. Practically every President we have had in office at a time of unrest in Europe has been unable to resist the temptation of dabbling in European affairs, usually to the detriment of the United States. I think the present situation has shown that there is a real danger in entrusting the foreign policy of this country to any one individual, no matter whe he may be or how earnest his desire for the cause of peace. The responsibility is too great to be borne by one person. Would it be ne may be of now earliest his desire for the cause of peace. The responsibility is too great to be borne by one person. Would it be practical to design legislation to place the formulation of foreign policy in the hands of the President and a committee from the Senate. The suggestion may not be of value, but, anyway, it is a Senate. thought.

Very truly yours,

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT OF 1937

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Before the Senator from Louisiana proceeds, will he permit the Chair to state that he regrets that on yesterday he did not observe in the RECORD the request of the Senator from Louisiana to be recognized. or else he would have recognized him? He apologizes to the Senator from Louisiana, as well as to the Senate, for not attending to his duty more faithfully.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, before proceeding to a discussion of the amendments to the Housing Act contained in the pending bill I shall elaborate some of the statements made by me yesterday in answer to the arguments advanced by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

The handling of all projects is divided into two distinct parts: First, the financing of the development or construction of a project; secondly, the payment of Federal and local annual subsidies to the completed project to bring down the rents. I shall now discuss the first proposition; that is, with reference to the financing of the development.

These two propositions must be held separate and apart in the minds of Members of the Senate. Two separate and distinct contracts are entered into between the United States Housing Authority and the local authority. The first contract deals exclusively with the financial end; the matter of obtaining the money with which to build the project. The second contract deals entirely with the subsidies which are to be paid by the United States Housing Authority and the local authorities. The financing of the development or construction of a project is entirely on an investment-loan basis. The local housing authority borrows not more than 90 percent of the development or construction cost from the United States Housing Authority. That is provided for in the bill. The limitation is written in the statute.

The local authority borrows not less than 10 percent of the development or construction cost of the project from local sources other than the Federal Government. Whether it be borrowed from the city, from local banks, or from other private investors, the point is that the money does not come from the Federal Government. The 90-percent Federal loan is evidenced by the obligations of the local housing authority, and is to be repaid in full, principal and interest, with an interest rate fixed by statute under a prescribed formula. Under said formula the rate of interest today is 3 percent. The 10 percent borrowed from local sources is also evidenced by the obligations of the local housing authority, and is to be repaid in full, principal and interest, with an interest rate which is generally not less than 3 percent, depending on the going Federal rate of interest.

The local loan, like the Federal loan, must be raised in cash, because cash is required to build a housing project. Under the law the 90 percent of the development cost borrowed from the U. S. H. A. cannot be advanced until the local housing authority has made arrangements to raise the 10 percent in cash from sources other than the Federal Government. The project cannot be completed and opened until the 10 percent borrowed locally is raised in cash, as well as the 90 percent borrowed from the Federal Government.

Now, let me read an excerpt from one of the contracts, which is in the usual form of contracts entered into between the U.S. H. A. and the local authority. Under section 3 of the contract it is specifically provided that—

The U. S. H. A. shall be under no obligation to the local authority to take up and pay for any bonds.

And then the contract sets out various conditions under which there shall be no such obligation. Among them is the following, under (c):

If the local authority shall not have obtained or entered into a contract to obtain in a form and upon terms satisfactory to the U.S. H. A. assistance equivalent to at least $60,000—

In this case; that is, in the case of the particular contract from which I am now reading—toward meeting the development cost of the project from sources other than the ${\tt U.\ S.\ H.\ A.}$

The contract from which I am reading is one that was executed between the Housing Authority and a local housing authority in Annapolis, Md. The total amount of loan that the U. S. H. A. agreed to make to the housing authority at Annapolis, Md., aggregated $478,000, and the local authority agreed to put up $60,000, which, as can be readily seen, is in excess of the limitation placed in the statute of not less than 10 percent.

Both the Federal 90 percent and the local 10 percent are on a strict loan basis. There is no Federal subsidy of any kind in the development or construction of a project, and no local subsidy of any kind is required by the act in the development or construction of a project. Therefore, the necessity for differentiating between the two propositions. The entire development or construction of a project is a matter of interest-bearing loans, a matter of Federal and local investment.

At the present time only 10 percent of the development loan cost of a project is being borrowed by the local housing authority from sources other than the Federal Government.

Ninety percent of the development loan cost of a project is being borrowed from the Federal Government. The United States Housing Authority is trying to encourage the local housing authorities to borrow much more than 10 percent of the cost for the development or construction of a project from sources other than the Federal Government, in order that the Federal loans for development or construction may be cut down to less than 90 percent. That is one of the purposes of an amendment to section 6 of the act, provided in the pending bill, which would make the obligations of local housing authorities available for investment by national banks. It will be readily seen that if the amendment is adopted, many of the bonds can be sold to private investors.

The time probably is near at hand when the local housing authority will borrow 20 or 30 or 50 percent of the development or construction cost of a project from sources other than the Federal Government, leaving only 80, 70, or 50 percent of the loans for the development cost of the project to be supplied by the Federal Government. This is a healthy tendency, because it will encourage the gradual investment of idle private capital in the development of housing projects.

It is an essential feature of the United States Housing Authority plan that the whole original development or construction cost of a project is kept on a strict loan or investment basis; the loan feature must not be confused with the subsidy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Herring in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not want to interrupt the continuity of the Senator's argument; but before he goes into further detail I wonder if he will permit me to ask him one or two general questions about the financial phase of the matter.

Mr. ELLENDER. Gladly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the pending bill is passed, how much will it add to the Federal Budget for the next fiscal year?

Mr. ELLENDER. If the bill is passed, no subsidies of any kind will be asked for until the projects are completed.

To give the Senator specific figures, the present Budget from the Interior Department asks for only $5,000,000 for subsidizing housing projects which have been completed, or are now being built, and will be completed this year.

The Government does not contribute a nickel of subsidy toward reducing rents until the lessees occupy the projects, and if the projects authorized under this bond issue are not completed before 1942, the Federal Government will not have to advance a penny of subsidy until that time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What will be the maximum additional budgetary burden if the bill shall be enacted?

Mr. ELLENDER. $73,000,000 for— Mr. VANDENBERG. Additional?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; $45,000,000 additional.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have read the committee report, and the reference to the Bureau of the Budget seems to be rather cryptic. I am unable to make out whether or not the Bureau of the Budget is favorable or unfavorable, or just quiescent. What does the final paragraph of the report mean in its reference to the Bureau of the Budget?

Mr. ELLENDER. On page 12?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. That refers to the amendment contemplated in the sixth section of the bill, proposing an amendment to the Banking Act giving these securities the same standing, as it were, with other Government securities, so that national banks may purchase them, may invest in them. The reason for the amendment is that instead of selling these bonds to the Government itself, the idea is to get as many of them purchased by private institutions as possible.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But this paragraph seems to refer to the enactment of the bill, not to any particular section of it.

Mr. ELLENDER. To which paragraph is the Senator referring? There are three on that page.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The final paragraph. I am referring to the fact that the report suggests that the Bureau of the Budget seems to have no objection to the submission of the legislation provided "no commitment" would be involved. Does that mean that the Bureau of the Budget simply is neutral in respect to the program?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; I would not say that. It merely means, as I interpret the language referred to by the Senator, that until a project is completed, no commitment for an appropriation to provide a Federal subsidy can be made by the Housing Authority. That is all that the paragraph intends to convey.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Unfortunately there is a typographical error in the paragraph; two lines are transposed. Let me read the next to the last sentence the way, evidently, it is intended to read:

The Interior Department advised the committee that it had received a communication from the Bureau of the Budget stating that there would be no objection to the submission of the United States Housing Authority's report with the understanding that no commitment would thereby be made with respect to the relationship of the proposed legislation to the program of the

That is what I am inquiring about. What does that mean-no commitment as to whether or not this collides with the President's financial program, which is to say, with the Budget? Does it mean that it does collide, or that they are not willing to say that it collides, or that they do not know whether it collides or not? What does it mean?

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator understands, of course, that before any project may be undertaken the President himself must O. K. it. I do not know exactly what the Budget had in mind.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is the Senator's report.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand; but evidently under the law no commitment for any appropriation for subsidies can be made until projects are actually completed. That is the reason for the statement quoted by the Senator. The law specifically provides that the authorized appropriation, in this bill, for instance, of $45,000,000, cannot be made available to the local housing authorities unless and until the projects to be built are actually completed, because that sum is to be used exclusively to reduce the rents of the lessees who will occupy the buildings.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand what the Senator is saying.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is what the letter from the Bureau of the Budget means, if it is read as a whole.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This is what I am trying to find out: The first sentence specifically states that the United States Housing Authority is favorable to the enactment of the bill. We know where they stand. Then it undertakes to state the position of the Interior Department and the Bureau of the Budget. I am unable to find out from the language what the attitude of the Interior Department and the Bureau of the Budget is. Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I am sure that the Interior Department is for the bill, because this activity is under the Interior Department.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am sorry, but I still seem to be in doubt as to what is meant by the reservation of a doubt regarding the President's financial program.

Mr. ELLENDER. I think the same language is used by the Bureau of the Budget in practically every recommendation it makes to Congress where an appropriation is concerned.

Mr. President, the second matter I propose to discuss is with reference to the annual Federal-loan subsidies for reducing rents. This aspect of the proposal must not be confused with the other feature I have just discussed; that is, regarding the raising of the funds to construct projects by the United States Housing Authority and by the local authority.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Why should it not be confused with the raising of the funds, when, as the Senator knows, the statute ties them together? In the first place, the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of all annual contributions. In the second place, payments under annual contribution contracts shall be pledged as security for any loans obtained by public-housing agencies to assist the development of the housing projects to which the annual contributions relate. Congress has tied the two together. This is a permanent appropriation for 60 years. The faith of the United States is pledged, and then that is used to secure the bonds, and even if the contracts can be revised in 10 years, there is going to be a moral obligation on the part of the United States to see that a sinking fund is supplied to pay the interest on all loans to housing authorities. So, I think, the Senator cannot say that the contributions are one thing and the loans another. It seems to me they are one and the same thing.

Mr. ELLENDER. The Senator is quite correct that the two features of the program are interlocking, but for the purposes of this discussion and in order to avoid confusion, it is desirable to discuss them separately. I state that no subsidy is to be advanced by the United States Housing Authority, no money is to be appropriated by the Congress, until a project is actually built. Of course, as a safeguard it is provided in the law that these contributions have first to be applied toward paying the interest and the principal on the debt involved. The contract provides specifically that the holders of the bonds shall have first preference in the contribution.

The subsidies or contributions toward all projects are paid only on an annual basis, as annual contributions, for the purpose of reducing rents after the projects are built.

There are neither Federal nor local subsidies in the form of capital grants during the construction of the project. The annual subsidies, both Federal and local, represent the amounts necessary to get the rents down to the level that slum dwellers can afford to pay.

That, Senators, is the reason in a nutshell why the Congress is asked to provide for an amount which, together with that appropriated by the municipality in the form of cash or tax remission, will be sufficient to cut the economic rent in half.

The method by which the annual contributions of subsidies are computed is as follows: After the project is built the United States Housing Authority in accord with the act itself calculates the annual charge against the project. including these items:

First. Debt service.

Second. Operation and management.

Third. Repairs, vacancies, insurance, and so forth. Fourth. Taxes (should they not be entirely remitted).

All these charges together make up the economic annual rent of the project, the amount that would be needed to be paid by the tenant if there were no annual subsidies. Then the United States Housing Authority calculates the amount of annual rent that can be paid by slum dwellers, which is generally what they are now paying in the slums. The difference between these two figures represents the annual subsidies, Federal and local, which must be paid to get the projects within the reach of slum dwellers.

This analysis makes it clear that neither the Federal annual subsidies nor the local annual subsidies are directed toward debt retirement, although it happens that the annual Federal subsidies needed to get such rents low enough are almost equivalent to the charges for debt retirement.

Both the Federal annual contribution and the local annual contribution are directed toward reducing the whole economic rent, which includes debt retirement, management, operation, insurance, repairs, vacancies, and taxes. However, there is a provision in the statute insuring that the annual contributions shall secure the loans, as was stated a minute ago by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft]. This is only logical, because the Federal subsidies should not be used for other purposes by a local authority that is defaulting on its loans, 90 percent of which are from the Federal Government.

The Federal annual contributions amount to about one-third of the economic rent, as I pointed out yesterday, and therefore constitute a 33½ percent rent subsidy. The local annual contributions represent about one-sixth of the economic rent, and therefore constitute a 16½ percent rent subsidy.

The Federal annual contribution and the local annual contribution taken together, therefore, cut the economic rent in half. The Federal and local annual contributions represent the same proportion of the economic rent as in England and in other countries having successful low-rent housing programs. All these countries finance the development or construction of their projects entirely on a loan basis, and subsidize them on an annual basis, directing their subsidies on an annual basis toward the reduction of rents and not toward capital charges alone.

The statute sets a maximum rate upon the Federal contributions which is the Federal going rate of interest, plus 1 percent, computed on the total cost of the project, and which is now equal to $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent of the development cost. The statute requires that the local annual contribution be at least 20 percent of the Federal annual contributions. But in fact the local annual contributions are averaging about 50 percent of the Federal annual contributions. This shows clearly that the local contribution in subsidies to housing projects is greater than the local contributions in practically any other social program assisted by the Federal Government.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Is it entirely through the granting of tax exemption that the localities contribute that money? How does the Senator figure the 50 percent?

Mr. ELLENDER. The 50 percent is figured this way. One-third is contributed by the Federal Government in cash, and one-sixth is contributed by the local communities by way of remitting taxes. In other words, in the example that was discussed yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings]—

Mr. TAFT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to an article published in this week's Saturday Evening Post entitled "Much Ado About Nothing. A Defense of the Government Program," by Rev. Edward Robert Moore, member of the New York City Housing Authority. The writer of the article is in favor of the housing plan. In it he discusses the question of tax contributions, and says that in the first place there is not any tax to speak of on the slum buildings, and that in one city of his acquaintance where a three-quarters of a million dollar project was in prospect, the tax yield on the property to be exempted was just $90. That would seem to contradict the theory that there is any substantial contribution by local authorities by way of exemption of taxes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, let us suppose that a local investor wanted to put up a building on that same plot of ground to which Mr. Moore refers, would not the local authorities, that is, of the municipality in which it was built, and the State and county authorities, be entitled to impose taxes on it?

Let us take the example to which I started to refer a while ago—the million-dollar project which was under discussion here yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Tydings].

When a project of that kind is undertaken, what really happens in most cases is that some of the dwellings which are now occupied by slum dwellers are torn away, and the land is leveled. That takes from the assessment roll of that locality an amount equal to whatever the assessment was on those buildings.

If a new building is constructed on that land, and one is erected, of course, when a contract is entered into, that adds a further investment on the property, and if it were privately owned the city government, the county government, and the State government could certainly assess taxes on that building.

If the building is valued, let us say, at $1,000,000, the average amount of city, county, and State taxes paid by a private owner on a building of that character aggregates about 2 percent. Two percent of $1,000,000 would be $20,000, and that is the amount of subsidy that the local authorities would be giving toward the reduction of the rents.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WAGNER. Since the law provides that there must be at least a 20-percent contribution by the municipality or the Housing Authority toward the economic rents, is it not a fact that if taxes do not represent 20 percent, then the municipality must make that up in some other way by the contribution of cash?

Mr. ELLENDER. It would have to be in cash or tax exemptions or remissions and amounting to at least 20 percent of the Federal subsidy.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course, in all the projects so far, the tax exemptions show a contribution greater than 20 percent, but I asked the question because of the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taff] that in some instances the tax exemption may not represent 20 percent. If it does not, then the municipality must make that up by the payment of cash.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Let me read extracts from the second housing contract to which I have just referred. They have to do with the question of subsidies. This will throw light on the point raised by the Senator from Ohio. On page 1 of this contract, which, by the way, is between the same authority to which I referred a while ago, the city of Annapolis, and the United States Housing Authority, appears the following:

Whereas the local authority certifies that it has the following assurances of its meeting the conditions precedent to such U.S. H. A. annual contributions: (i) the legal and enforceable right under the public general laws of Maryland to full exemptions of the local authority and the project from all taxes and special assessments of the city, the State, or any political subdivision thereof—

That language is incorporated in each and every contract for subsidies that is made. So it can well be seen that a municipality, a county and/or a State would have the right to place a tax on the value of that improvement, and which taxes usually equal 2 percent of the cash value of the imimprovement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Even though it is desirable in this kind of a law that taxes should be remitted, I doubt whether the city has the constitutional right to make such an agreement. Is there any doubt on that question?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; there is not, because the city acts under a statute passed by the State legislature.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the State legislature the right to pass such an act? Might there not be a constitutional inhibition against such action by the legislature?

Mr. ELLENDER. Of course, that may be true with reference to some State taxes; but I believe that since a municipality is a creature of the legislature, the State legislature could well pass a law providing for a tax exemption by the municipality, or even by the county.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield. Mr. BARKLEY. Aside from any housing project, it is true that in many of the States, under State laws and constitutions, the cities have the right to exempt property from taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. If the right exists under State constitutions, I raise no question.

Mr. BARKLEY. It so happens that in many States cities offer exemption from taxation for 5 years as an inducement for new enterprises to come into the city. Of course, it depends on the authority conferred upon the city by the State legislature, or the constitution of the State.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I will say further in answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] that in all cases the Housing Authority provides for a legal opinion on the matter; and if there is any doubt a test case is brought before the proper tribunal. From time to time circumstances have given rise to a doubt, and test cases actually have been brought before the courts of the States wherein the projects are to be built, so as to clear the legal atmosphere.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to ask the able Senator from Louisiana whether or not such a test case has been brought in the courts of the State of Illinois.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am informed one has been brought.

Mr. LUCAS. Has the supreme court of our State passed upon the question?

Mr. ELLENDER. It is my understanding that it has passed upon the issue.

Mr. LUCAS. The question is a very interesting one; and I should like very much to have the Senator place in the RECORD the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois is deciding that question. The constitution of our State was adopted many, many years ago; and one section of our revenue act provides that all property must be assessed uniformly. As I recall, it has been held time and time again that under no circumstances could an exemption of the character which the Senator is now discussing be granted. Because of the "uniformity" section and the section of the revenue act to which I have referred, we have been unable to have an income-tax law in our State. The only way we could have it would be to change the constitution. We have not been able to do that; and now before us the question vitally affects our State. I should like very much to have the Senator place in the RECORD the dicision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, because I am interested in what the court has said on that question. I have seen similar contingencies challenge the constitution of our State in various ways and if there has been a reversal upon the part of the court I am obviously very much interested.

Mr. ELLENDER. It is my information that the State of Illinois was one of the doubtful States; a test case was filed, and a decision has been rendered upholding the right of the municipality to grant tax exemptions. I shall be glad to obtain a copy of the decision, or an excerpt therefrom, and place it in the RECORD as early as possible.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand the decision is by the Supreme Court of Illinois.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is my understanding.

Further reading from the contract, with reference to subsidies, on page 2, under (b):

That during the useful life of the project, which shall in no event be less than the number of years during which any of the obligations issued to assist in the development of the project shall remain outstanding, it will not levy, impose, or charge any taxes, assessments, fees, or charges against the project or against the local authority for or with respect to the project, and will furnish without charge municipal services and facilities for the project and the tenants thereof of the same character as those furnished without charge for other dwellings and inhabitants of the city.

That provision with reference to subsidies is likewise incorporated in contract between the local authorities and the United States Housing Authority.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly explain the last paragraph he read?

Mr. ELLENDER. To which paragraph does the Senator refer?

Mr. McCARRAN. I refer to the last excerpt which the Senator read a moment ago from the contract. Will the Senator kindly explain it?

Mr. ELLENDER. The language is:

And will furnish without charge municipal services and facilities for the project-

Mr. McCARRAN. I refer to the entire excerpt which the Senator read from the document which he holds in his hand. It was the last excerpt read to the Senate.

Mr. ELLENDER. I shall be glad to read it.

That during the useful life of the project, which shall in no event be less than the number of years during which any of the obligations issued to assist in the development of the project shall remain outstanding, it will not levy, impose, or charge any taxes, assessments, fees, or charges against the project—

That simply means tax exemption. So long as the bonds are outstanding-in this case 60 years-there is an obligation on the part of the local authority to make no assessment of any kind.

Mr. McCARRAN. Will the Senator kindly explain the latter part of the paragraph?

Mr. ELLENDER. It reads-

And will furnish without charge municipal services and facilities for the project and the tenants thereof of the same character as those furnished without charge for other dwellings and inhabitants of the city.

Mr. McCARRAN. What is meant by that language? Will the Senator kindly explain what the language means?

Mr. ELLENDER. That may mean— Mr. McCARRAN. No; what does it mean? I am not interested in what it may mean.

Mr. ELLENDER. The law provides—
Mr. McCARRAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. Will he kindly explain just what the language means, and not what the law provides? We are now making the law. We have a law in the making. Will not the Senator kindly explain the language?

Mr. ELLENDER. I cannot explain the language if I may not refer to the act. I will let the Senator explain it. I do not know. In other words, I cannot take the language just as it is without referring to the law itself. The law itself provides that instead of a tax remission the local authority may pay cash, so long as it pays not less than 20 percent of the Federal subsidy.

Mr. McCARRAN. Where is the 20 percent in the excerpt which the Senator read?

Mr. ELLENDER. This is a case in which all the taxes are not remitted. As the Senator knows, under the law the local authority must pay not less than 20 percent of the Federal subsidy in order to help subsidize the low-rent project.

Mr. McCARRAN. The payment is made by way of remission of taxes.

Mr. ELLENDER. It may be paid in cash or by remission

Mr. McCARRAN. Of course, the latter will be the way in which it will be paid.

Mr. ELLENDER. Certainly; but in the event it is not, that provision is necessarily in the contract. The act does not specifically provide that the tax exemption shall be an entire exemption, but it says that the local contribution, in cash or tax remission, or both, shall be not less than 20 percent of the amount contributed by the Federal Govern-

Mr. McCARRAN. I may be in error. I hope I am, because I am in favor of the principle behind the act. Will the Senator again read the latter part of the excerpt which he read just a moment ago?

Mr. ELLENDER. Certainly.

That during the useful life of the project, which shall in no event be less than the number of years which any of the obligations issued to assist in the development of the project shall remain outstanding, it will not levy—

Mr. McCARRAN. That means that the project must run as long as the bonds are outstanding.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is plain enough.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is plain.

It will not levy, impose, or charge any taxes, assessments, fees, or charges against the project or against the local authority for or with respect to the project—

Mr. McCARRAN. What does the language "or against the local authority for or with respect to the project" mean?
Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator vield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. My understanding of that provision is that it is a safeguard against the municipal government substituting some other form of taxes in place of the taxes which it has agreed to remit. A city might pass an ordinance providing that in all cases in which taxes are remitted and buildings are constructed there should be some sort of a gross income tax, or something of that sort. The purpose of this provision is to prevent a substitute for the taxes which the city agrees to remit.

Mr. McCARRAN. In other words, any tax which might be conjured up shall be remitted.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. It seems to me the language goes even further. As I construe the language read by the Senator, there could not even be a tax for the maintenance of the property.

Mr. ELLENDER. A tax for maintenance by whom? It cannot be by the city.

Mr. McCarran. No; but for upkeep of the property. I know what the Senator's argument is, but somebody else is going to argue this after the Senator is all through with it. Taking the language, it seems to me the property could not even be kept going, it could not be sustained. The entire project is on the basis of the old theory of cooperative apartments.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am satisfied that if the Senator will read the first section of the contract that I have quoted, and the second section, and the section I propose to read, there will be no doubt left in his mind that, under this contract, there is a remission of all taxes on the project, and that is the contribution by the municipality to the local authority in aid of reducing rents.

Mr. McCARRAN. What I am most interested in is, does the property become not only a property against which there shall be no taxes, but does it become a burden on the municipality for upkeep?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; it could not.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not know about that. If the Senator will read that language again, and apply his own splendid knowledge of the law, I think he might have some doubt.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not see how it could, because all the terms of the contract are to be read together. What really happens is that the project becomes a separate entity, as it were, of itself.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am familiar with the old rule that went along with the "own your own apartment" plan. We went through that period in this country, and we are still going through it, and it has not been altogether a success. I am also familiar with the cooperative-apartment system. I think that this plan is more nearly in keeping with the cooperative-apartment system—I may be wrong, but as I understood it—always provided a residue for the upkeep of the apartment, for maintenance, heating, lighting, and so forth, and so on. In this language, however, it seems to me—I hope I may be wrong, for we are now making history here that will be used to construe the law in the future—that we are leaving out of the law any obligation on the part of those who manage these apartments to have the upkeep of the apartments come out of the rentals from the apartments. I hope I am wrong in that respect.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. ELLENDER. There is an existing contract between the local authority itself and the U. S. H. A., first, with reference to building the project, which refers to this subsequent contract, and then there is a binding agreement between the U. S. H. A. and the local authority that the rents will be kept down and will be used for certain specified purposes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator construe that to mean that the rent will be kept down to the point where the upkeep of the apartment would fall back on the Federal Government?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; I do not see how it could be so construed.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Holman in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator if it is not correct to say that each tenant is to be charged for the occupation of the particular dwelling, and there are taken into consideration all the fixed charges—

Mr. McCARRAN. Of which upkeep is one.

Mr. WAGNER. Of which upkeep is one, and debt service is the other, and whatever goes into the maintenance of the particular building. That is calculated in determining what rent would have to be charged if the occupants should be required to pay a rental which would make the enterprise profitable, but, since these are slum dwellers of the low-income group, the Federal Government and the States are going to pay the difference between the rent which would have to be charged in order to make the tenant pay all these expenses and the rent which he can afford to pay. In determining that item and in determining the subsidy all those fixed charges are taken into consideration. So they are not a burden except as the payment of a subsidy, and a rent subsidy is a burden upon the States and the Federal Government. That is the theory of the proposed legislation.

Mr. McCARRAN. I take it that the primary theory of the proposed legislation is that for the protection of the health of the people of the country the Federal Government will enter into an agreement or a condition of this kind?

Mr. WAGNER. To make a contribution; yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I am going to read a further paragraph from the contract pertaining to annual contributions between the Authority of Annapolis, Md., and the United States Housing Authority. So far, I have read two excerpts from the contract to show the precautions that are taken by the United States Housing Authority in having it understood in advance what the municipality must do in order to obtain subsidies from the U. S. H. A. so that rents may be reduced.

That is paragraph 4; and among the requirements listed in that paragraph is the following:

The local authority has received local annual contributions (as hereinafter defined in paragraph 8) in aid of the project which equal at least 20 percent of the annual contribution from the U.S. H. A.

In other words, before any contribution is made by the Federal Government toward any subsidy, it must first be shown by the municipality that it has contributed its share in accordance with the law and the contract which has been entered into between the local housing authority and the U. S. H. A.

While it happens at the present time, as indicated above, that the maximum Federal annual contributions are almost equivalent to the debt service, the two obligations are quite independent.

The Federal annual contributions may be reduced in succeeding years as the economic character of the projects changes so that smaller Federal subsidies will be needed to continue renting the units at a reasonable cost to low-income workers. Of course, the debt-service payments of the local authorities on both Federal and local loans would remain constant, so that when the annual Federal contributions are reduced they would amount to a lesser portion of the debt service as time goes on.

The experience of all housing programs abroad shows that annual contributions are gradually reduced in succeeding years as wages rise and costs of housing construction and administration decline, and for other reasons. The statute expressly requires that the annual contributions be reexamined and reduced in the light of changed economic conditions at the end of 10 years, and every 5 years thereafter.

This discussion makes it absolutely clear that the localities furnish about 50 percent as much of the annual subsidy for every project as the Federal Government furnishes. There are no subsidies but only investments in connection with the capital development of projects.

So far as these investments are concerned, the local housing authority borrows not more than 90 percent of the funds from the Federal Government, and borrows not less than 10 percent of the funds from other sources. It is expected in the future that a larger percentage of the loans will be borrowed from sources other than the Federal Government.

On yesterday, during the discussion, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Byrn] asked me if I could state the number of units in each project, together with the number of rooms in each unit, and the cost. I have before me a statement covering the identical projects that I mentioned on yesterday.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator about to give us details of the projects which were completed by the P. W. A.? My understanding is that no projects have been completed by Mr. Straus' organization.

Mr. ELLENDER. The projects included in this statement are all under contract or construction by the U. S. H. A. The Senator is correct in his statement that no projects have as yet been completed by the U. S. H. A.

Mr. KING. They have a large number of projects on paper, and have spent a great deal of money, but not a single project has been completed.

Mr. ELLENDER. No, Mr. President; as a matter of fact, not much money has been spent.

Mr. KING. Well, it is contracted to be spent.

Mr. ELLENDER. It is true that contracts have been entered into, but very little money has been spent in proportion to the amount authorized under the act. As a matter of fact, if I correctly recall the figures, the amount of bonds actually sold to this day is about $100,000,000—that is all—although the U. S. H. A. is authorized to sell $800,000,000 of bonds.

Mr. KING. But, coming to the question which I asked, if the Senator will pardon me, what project has been completed and rented to persons who are now occupying it?

Mr. ELLENDER. By the U.S. H. A.?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. ELLENDER. None. Two will be completed within the next 2 months.

Mr. KING. So the Senator is merely speculating now as to what the costs are going to be?

Mr. ELLENDER. No, sir; it is not a matter of speculation, because contracts for these projects have already been entered into between the local housing authorities and contractors, and every contract is bonded for faithful performance.

Mr. KING. But no contracts have yet been made with individuals. They have not been placed in any of these buildings. They have not taken out any leases. They have not been housed. They have not entered into any contracts under the terms of which they are bound to occupy certain buildings or certain rooms for a given length of time.

Mr. ELLENDER. No; that has not been done. There has been no occupancy, for the obvious reason that none of the projects have yet been completed, but there will not be any difficulty in having the units occupied. That will be the next step after any particular unit is actually completed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. In the opinion of the Senator, what has been the cause of the delay? This act was passed 2 years ago. If not a single project is being occupied at this time, what is the cause of the delay?

Mr. ELLENDER. One of the causes of the delay, to begin with, is that the legislatures of the various States first had to pass laws authorizing the creation of local authorities; and after these laws were passed, as the Senator well knows, it required quite a good deal of time to organize the local corporations, prepare contracts and plans to meet the requirements specified in the law, and so forth. I may say that up to the present time loan contracts totaling $409,698,000 have been approved under which the work is going on, and under some of which the projects will be completed within the next 2 months, and others within the next 3 months, and so on. In addition to the loan contracts approved, earmarkings are now outstanding aggregating $246,941,000; or a total of earmarkings and contracts actually entered into of $656,639,000.

Mr. BYRD. When does the Senator think the first project will be occupied?

Mr. ELLENDER. Two of the projects—I do not recall their locations at the present time—will be completed within the next 60 days.

Mr. BYRD. How many projects in all are there?

Mr. ELLENDER. One hundred and eighty-one projects have been actually contracted for.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for the purpose of making a statement in regard to the value of city dwellings?

Mr. ELLENDER. Certainly.

Mr. BYRD. There was some discussion on the floor yesterday between the Senator from Louisiana and myself on that subject. I have obtained the records from the Department of Commerce, Bureau of the Census.

The average value of all nonfarm residences—that means residences in the cities—including land and development, is $4,100.

In addition to that, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the average value of 44 percent of the dwellings occupied by farmers is $1,000, and that only 4 percent are reported as being worth more than $5,000.

I should also like to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that the average value of all the farm buildings—that is, the barns and other buildings—per farm unit is $4,823, and that under this bill the cost of constructing buildings for the purposes of slum clearance is considerably in excess of the average value of the city dwellings, and very much in excess, four or five times as much as the average value of the dwellings on the farms.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know how the Bureau of the Census obtains its information?

Mr. BYRD. I cannot give the Senator that information. Mr. ELLENDER. I myself have furnished quite a bit of information to the Bureau of the Census, and I suppose the Senator also has furnished some. When the census will be taken in 1940, let us say, the Senator from Virginia will be asked, "What is your home worth?" The home may have been built 50 years ago; the home may have been built 50 years ago; it may have been built 2 years ago. Whatever amount the Senator from Virginia writes into the report which he gives to the census taker will be used to average up the cost to which the Senator is just referring.

I, myself, distinctly recall having filled out some of those reports pertaining to my own home, and pertaining to a few farmhouses on my own farm; and so far as the answers submitted by me were concerned, they were pure guesswork. They did not represent the actual value of the house, how much it actually cost when it was built or its present value.

but the amount was put in at $1,000, or $1,500, or $2,500. It is figures of that kind to which the Senator is referring.

Mr. BYRD. In addition to the figures obtained by the Census Bureau, which the Senator claims are not correct—

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not say they are not correct, but I am just outlining to the Senator the basis for them, how they are obtained. It is my opinion that the average figures cited by the able Senator are founded on pure guesses.

Mr. BYRD. If the Senator is correct, then we had better abolish the Bureau of the Census, and not have any more censuses taken.

Mr. ELLENDER. It may be that a new method for obtaining such information should be employed.

Mr. BYRD. In addition to that, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in 1934 the Department of Commerce, through Secretary Daniel C. Roper, issued a bulletin on housing conditions in the United States, showing that in 64 cities the value of 8 percent of the dwellings, including the land and all the costs, was under $1,000; the value of 7 percent was under $1,500; the value of 9 percent was under $2,000; the value of 18 percent was under $3,000. That means that according to this statement of 1934, which was not a part of the census and evidently was prepared by the agents of the Department of Commerce, 41 percent of the dwellings in the cities cost less than $3,000, 30 percent of them cost between $3,000 and $5,000, and about 30 percent cost in excess of $5,000.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator know the source of that information? May it not have been obtained from the census reports and compiled by the Department of

Mr. BYRD. No census was taken in 1934.

Mr. ELLENDER. No; but the preceding census may have been taken into consideration.

Mr. BYRD. I would not condemn the Department of Commerce to the extent that the Senator does.

Mr. ELLENDER. I am not condemning the Department. It should not be blamed if the home owner makes a bad guess. In other words, as I recall the questions which are asked in connection with the various census reports, they are, "What is the building worth?" or "What did it cost?" The age of the dwelling is not usually asked. The figure does not include the land. It does not include facilities around the building. All of that is segregated.

Mr. BYRD. The figures which I have given to the Senator include not only the land but the cost of the development, the cost of the building, and I think are approximately correct.

The point I want to make clear is that under the operations of this act it is costing substantially more to provide dwellings for those who heretofore have lived in the slums than the average American has invested in his home in the city, and four or five times as much as the average farmer has invested in the home in which he lives.

Mr. ELLENDER. The testimony which was given to the committee by various witnesses shows that the cost of the United States Housing Authority dwellings is actually $1,000 less per dwelling unit than that of privately constructed dwellings.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ELLENDER. Gladly.

Mr. WAGNER. Is it not true that the only way to make a reliable comparison between the respective costs of private construction and public construction is to take the costs in an area where a project is being constructed, and figure the difference there between the cost of private construction and the cost of public construction? That would be a comparison which would be reliable, and would disclose the real facts.

Mr. ELLENDER. It would seem so, and if the Senator has such information, I would appreciate his placing it in the Record at this time.

Mr. WAGNER. I have here the figures as to a project located in Allentown, Pa. The net construction cost per dwelling unit of the United States Housing Authority project, based on approved construction contracts, was $3,123. The average net construction cost during the 10 months of 1938 of privately constructed dwellings in the same area was $5,737. There is an intelligent comparison, because we are taking what it costs in that area to build a dwelling privately constructed as compared with what it costs to erect a dwelling by the Government. There is a difference of over $2,000 per dwelling unit in that area.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield at that point?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that in Manhattan in 1936 the cost per family apartment house was $4,300, in Brooklyn $3,700, in the Bronx $3,540, in Richmond $3,125, and in Queens $2,333, right in the Senator's own city.

Mr. WAGNER. Are those figures from census reports?
Mr. BYRD. These figures are gotten out by the B. T.
E. A.—the Building Trade Employers' Association.

Mr. ELLENDER. What is the source of their information? Might not they have gotten that information from the Census Bureau, the same as the other agencies did?

Mr. BYRD. They could not have gotten it from the

Mr. BYRD. They could not have gotten it from the Census Bureau, because these figures relate to 1936, and there was no census taken in that year.

Mr. ELLENDER. True there was no census taken, but the figures of the last census are always available.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. For a question.

Mr. PEPPER. Is it not the objective of the law and the program to build houses which will afford housing opportunities, of a decent character, at the lowest possible figure, taking into consideration the minimum housing standards which should be observed, and the longevity of the structure?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

Mr. PEPPER. And has not that been the principle upon which the program has been carried on since it was started?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is my understanding.

Mr. PEPPER. Is it not a fact that it is the desire of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from New York, and should it not be the desire of the United States Government, to improve the standards of housing in the United States, many of the poor shanties in which entered into the calculations and the averages that were given by the eminent Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct.

As I was stating a few minutes ago, before I was interrupted, I have before me a statement pertaining to the same projects to which I referred yesterday, giving the number of rooms and the number of units in each project, all of which is in addition to the information I previously submitted to the Senate.

Let us take the project in Daytona Beach, Fla. This project has 659.5 rooms, and 167 units. The average cost over all, was $2,865 per unit. The average dwelling facilities cost per room was $620; per unit, $2,447. The average net construction cost per unit was $1,890.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read all of this statement, but at the proper time I shall ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

I desire to state further that the average per unit cost of the 48 projects which are named in this statement was $4,731. Since the time this statement was drawn up, additional projects have been let, totaling 140, and the average per unit cost of those 140, which includes the 48 referred to in this statement, is $4,507; in other words, there is shown a decrease of approximately $200 in the average cost per unit. I now send the statement to which I have referred to the desk and ask that it be incorporated as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Hill in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, let me refer briefly to the changes which are proposed in the pending bill. I may say that all of the amendments except as to those which propose an additional sum of $800,000,000, to be issued in the form of bonds, and the necessary authorization to subsidize the projects after they are built, do not change in any wise the policy of the bill. They are minor amendments, suggested by United States Housing Authority officials to make the bill more workable.

The bill provides for the authorizing of additional projects, the United States Housing Authority to loan $800,000,000 to that end, and the issuance of additional bonds by the United States Housing Authority in that amount. The bill also provides an authorization for the appropriation of an additional $45,000,000 annually. The $45,000,000 is to be used by the United States Housing Authority in entering into contracts for Federal subsidies with local authorities, not only under the $800,000,000 provided for in the pending bill, but also under the $150,000,000, appropriated in the act of 1937, which remains unexpended. It also provides for funds to take care of subsidies, if and when a sale is completed by the authority, of those housing projects which were built under the Public Works Administration, and which the United States Housing Authority has been authorized, under the law, to dispose of. I may say that under the present law the United States Housing Authority is authorized to sell these Public Works Authority projects to the local authorities, and the amount to be obtained for those projects is the actual amount the Government has spent for them, and aggregates $123,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. Some figures were exhibited to me a few days ago showing that the P. W. A. and Mr. Tugwell had spent approximately $200,000,000 for these projects, and that they had charged off 45 or 50 percent, if not the entire amount. I was wondering how much of that entire amount, whether it was the amount the Senator just stated or $200,000,000, had been charged off as a loss to the Government.

Mr. ELLENDER. Let us not confuse the P. W. A. housing projects with the projects which were built under the old Resettlement Administration, which is now administered by the Farm Security Administration. I have no reference to that. I do not know the situation as to the Resettlement projects. The United States Housing Authority has not been authorized to manage or have anything to do with them. They are under a different department.

I do admit that in the case of many of those projects the money expended was far in excess of what should have been spent; in other words, I believe that it was folly for Mr. Tugwell to spend as much as six or seven thousand dollars to build a home on a 40-acre tract, when the revenues from the farm would hardly pay the upkeep of the home, much less the interest and the principal of the investment. But let us not confuse Mr. Tugwell's projects with the P. W. A. housing projects.

The P. W. A. projects were built by the Government. The entire sum was put up by the Government. When the rental rates were fixed, they were based on 55 percent of the cost of the projects, and those dwellings are now all occupied; they are paying out.

Under the law as it now is, the U. S. H. A. has authority to sell these P. W. A. projects to local communities under virtually the same terms and conditions as would exist should new projects be built. That is the reason why in this bill we have provided authorization for the U. S. H. A. to enter into contracts, and, of course, provide the necessary money in order to subsidize those buildings to the same extent as new projects. The annual Federal contribution for these P. W. A. projects will amount to $4,305,000, and the total amount required annually to subsidize all the projects authorized under the pending bill, should it pass, including the $150,000,000 remaining under the 1937 act, will be $44,975,000, or in round figures $45,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. La Follette in the Chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. In the investigations which were made by the committee, of which the Senator from Louisiana is an honored member, was there any testimony before it showing the amount of money expended for building for occupation by the poor and the needy, under Mr. Tugwell's administration and under the P. W. A.?

Mr. ELLENDER. No, Mr. President; there was no such

Mr. KING. Was there any testimony showing the value of the properties which they acquired, the houses they constructed, and the losses which the Government will sustain by reason of—I was about to say their mad adventures, but I will not—their foolish adventures in many respects?

Mr. ELLENDER. There was not. There was no testimony as to cost of resettlement projects nor was there, as I recall, any testimony with reference to cost of P. W. A. housing projects but the U. S. H. A. has jurisdiction over the P. W. A. projects, and it was authorized under the act of 1937 to make sales to the local authorities, or leases when it did not have funds sufficient to enter into subsidy contracts; to perfect or transfer title from itself to the local authorities.

Mr. KING. Will the corporation represented in this bill have charged to it in its bookkeeping accounts the alleged value of the property which is turned over to them from the P. W. A.?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes, sir. It is valued at $123,000,000. That is the amount which the Government has spent on those projects, and the plan is, as I understand, to resell them to local authorities for the same amount or virtually the same amount as was actually paid out by the Government itself.

Mr. KING. I assume that in the P. W. A. projects, a part of the cost of the projects was paid by private capital, or was it all paid by the Government?

Mr. ELLENDER. All paid by the Government.

Mr. KING. So that if we should not salvage something from the sale of the properties, the entire amount would be a loss?

Mr. ELLENDER. Of course, if an earthquake should swallow them it would be an entire loss, but the buildings are there, they are being occupied, they are being rented, and the rents are being collected. They are paying out. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that the projects which were built under the P. W. A. take care of a rather different class from these slum dwellers. A little higher rent is being paid. They provide for a class of citizens who receive $2,000 per year and up.

The third amendment in the bill provides a new definition for "going Federal rate of interest." In providing for the "going Federal rate of interest," as defined in the law as presently written, Congress had in mind the rate of interest that was to be paid on any bond issue of the United States Government issued for a period of 10 or more years. This definition changes under the bill now under discussion, so that the rate of interest paid on the Housing Act bonds issued for 10 to 14 years, or on any other Government bonds issued for 10 to 14 years, shall be the yardstick used in determining the "going Federal rate of interest." In other words, the minimum interest rate on the U. S. H. A. bonds should have a direct relation to the interest rate borne by any U. S. H. A. bonds, rather than other Government bonds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Suppose the going rate of interest upon Government bonds today is, say, 2 percent, and by reason of conditions which we may foresee, depending on whether we are pessimists or optimists, extreme new dealers, or rational common-sense legislators—

Mr. ELLENDER. Or middle-of-the-road statesmen.

Mr. KING. Or middle-of-the-way legislators. Then suppose that the condition of the country was such as to depreciate the value of bonds, and in order to borrow the money—and we have borrowed nearly $40,000,000,000—it should cost us 5 or 6, or 4 percent, say, in 5 or 10 years from now, do I understand that we are committed now for 60 years to an interest rate which is today, say, 1% percent, or 1½ percent?

Mr. ELLENDER. No.

Mr. KING. Or may there be a change according to the sliding scale of advance or depression of interest rates?

Mr. ELLENDER. When the contract is entered into and bonds are issued by a local authority the rate of interest is then determined in accordance with the law; that is, the "going Federal rate of interest" is taken into consideration, which is at present the rate of interest paid on Government bonds with a maturity of 10 years. If that be 21/2 percent, which it has been right along, the authority enters into a contract with the local authority and bonds are issued providing for a 3-percent interest rate. That is, 21/2 percent plus 1/2 percent, as the statute now provides. When the U. S. H. A. borrows money it does so on the same basis, and at the same rate of interest that the Treasury does. which is at present 1% percent. Of course should the worst come to the worst and that rate of interest increase, as suggested by the Senator from Utah, it is possible that the rate of interest paid by the U.S. H. A. may equal that which is paid to the U.S. H. A. from the bonds of the local authority, and may exceed it, in which case, of course, there would be a loss.

But if the rates of interest are greater that will probably mean more business which will offset the loss. The people who are occupying these projects will then be better off. They will be able to pay more rents. The Authority retains the right to amend the contracts every 5 years if it so desires.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I do not understand, however, that bonds issued by the local housing authority to private individuals, bearing, say, 3-percent interest for 60 years, can be revised by anybody.

Mr. ELLENDER. No; they could be, Senator. The bonds that are purchased by the U. S. H. A. from the local authority in exchange for the money it lends are retained by the U. S. H. A. and the U. S. H. A. issues its own bonds, and those bonds are usually short-term bonds of 2 to 5 years, and the rate of interest on those short maturities is really small in comparison to what it would be on long-term

Mr. TAFT. Referring to the 60-year bonds issued by the local authorities to the U.S. H. A. can the U.S. H. A. raise the rate of interest on those bonds?

Mr. ELLENDER. No.

Mr. TAFT. So if the United States Government had to pay 4 percent there would be a loss rather than a profit?

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. I thought I had made that plain in answer to the question asked by the Senator from Utah. The Senator is correct. But as I just explained, in order to offset that, the Authority has the right, under the act and retains that right under the subsidy contract, to subsequently revise the contracts, and the loss can be minimized by raising the rent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. KING. Then if I understand, if the rate of interest which the Government had to pay, say, in 4 or 5 years from now, was 3 percent, then the Housing Authority on the credit which it obtains would have to pay that rate of interest?

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. KING. So that it may eventuate, as just indicated by the Senator from Ohio, in a loss to the Housing

Mr. ELLENDER. If the worst comes to the worst, that will happen.

Mr. KING. Which the Government of the United States would lose?

Mr. ELLENDER. If the worst comes to our country, that could happen. I think it is a general rule that when interest rates are high and money is in demand more business is carried on and the people are more prosperous. If the cycle should work that way, necessarily the slum dwellers would be better off. There would be more and better employment for them, and they would be able to pay greater

Mr. KING. In other words, the Government holds the

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not know that it holds the bag. Of course it guarantees the bonds. There is no doubt about that. However, the bonds are secured, as it were, by the projects and the revenues derived from them. The projects are really self-liquidating. Of course, if the worst is to happen, as the Senator has just indicated, I can see the possibility of a loss. We might have an earthquake in the city of New York which might swallow up Manhattan Island. In that event, of course, there would be a total loss. However, if things go on as they normally do, I do not believe we can expect any losses of any kind. The projects are self-liquidating. And as I have pointed out, as projects are being built and as new contracts are being entered into the cost per unit is decreasing.

Another clarifying amendment in the bill is with reference to the definition of the word "project." The term "project" is used throughout the act, but no definition of it appears. The definition of "project" as set forth in this bill includes any number of projects which may be undertaken by the same local authority, so that one authority can supervise several projects built in the same locality.

As I pointed out awhile ago, another amendment deals with declaring the bonds of these public-housing agencies to be of the same class as other Government bonds, so that national banks may buy them for investment purposes. The amendment is for the purpose of encouraging the flow of private capital into the low-rent housing field. In other words, it is hoped that by adopting this amendment the local housing authority, instead of raising only 10 percent of the development cost from private sources and calling upon the U. S. H. A. for the remaining 90 percent, will be able to raise, say, 20 percent or 30 percent or 50 percent from private capital, thus reducing the amount to be borrowed from the U. S. H. A. to 80 percent or 70 percent or 50 percent, as the case may be.

Another amendment proposed in the bill would permit expenses of projects owned by the U.S. H. A. to continue to be paid out of rents collected from those projects, rather than charge them against the administrative expenses of the Authority in Washington. It is desirable that this policy be incorporated into permanent legislation. This was demonstrated by the points of order recently raised in the House against these provisions in the Interior Department appropriations bill. The costs covered by this amendment are directly chargeable to the housing agencies and should be treated as nonadministrative expenses.

The other remaining amendment is to remove an ambiguity in the wording of section 9 of the act, regarding computation of the period of repayment of the loans made by the Authority. There is some question as to how this should be figured under the present wording of the act, and the amendment simply makes it plain that the period for loan repayment begins with the date of execution of the bonds, rather than with the date of the United States Housing Authority contract to make the loan.

Mr. President, that about concludes my remarks with reference to the bill. If there are any further questions I shall gladly answer them. If there are no further questions, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

IMPORTATION OF INFESTED BULBS

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, at the conclusion of my remarks, I intend to send to the desk, to lie on the table, a Senate resolution which I present on behalf of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] and myself. The question involved in this particular resolution is not of general importance so far as the citizens of the other sections of the country are concerned, but it is of extreme importance so far as a large number of the citizens of the States of Washington and Oregon are concerned, and involves, in addition to that, in my opinion, a question of the integrity of this body and the relationship which should be observed by governmental departments toward the Senate of the United States.

If I may go back into the history of the situation involved. which concerns the Plant and Quarantine Act which is under the administration of the Department of Agriculture, in 1923, because of the fact that it was found that bulbs shipped into this country from various foreign countries, particularly Holland, were infested to such an extent as to become a menace to the bulb industry in the United States, the Bureau of Plant Industry issued an order, which became effective in 1926, which prohibited the importation into this country of narcissus and iris bulbs, for the reason that it had been found that they had been infested with the nematode eel worm. At various times between 1926 and 1935 the representatives of the Agricultural Department, in statements made in their reports, and in statements made at various meetings throughout the country, reasserted their position, and asserted, in fact, that their investigation still showed that the bulbs which might come in from foreign countries were still so infested that the quarantine must, of necessity, be continued for the protection of our own plants.

In 1935, without any particular warning to those engaged in the business in this country and without any specific hearing upon the question, the Bureau of Plant Quarantine issued an order on January 14, 1935, in which they said-and I quote:

point of fact, the evidence at hand clearly indicates that the establishment of these pests (bulb eelworm and greater bulb fly) in this country is now so widespread and so impossible of eradication by any reasonable means that such reinfestation as may take place with unlimited importations under permit and inspection at p entry of certified bulbs will have no bearing on their control. In other words, the opportunity of eradication of these pests has passed.

The position taken by the Department at that time was that our own fields were so infested with the eelworm and with bulb flies that it was unnecessary longer to protect them; that no matter how many infested foreign bulbs might come into this country they still could have no possible effect upon our situation because our condition was as bad as it possibly could be. The second position was that the Department would be able to protect against the importation of foreign bulbs by inspection at the port of entry.

As a result of that action by the Department of Agriculture, on May 13, 1935, in the Seventy-fourth Congress I introduced a bill known as S. 2983, to amend the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912. This particular bill required the continuation of the quarantine against narcissus and iris bulbs. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill referred to may be printed in the Record at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES May 13 (calendar day, June 4), 1935.

Mr. Schwellenbach introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912 (37 Stat. 317, ch. 308, sec. 7), be amended by inserting after the words "shall become and be effective on August 20, 1912," the following: "Provided further, That hereafter the importation of narcissus and iris bulbs is prohibited, except that new and rare varieties not available in the United States may be imported under special permit for propagation purposes only in quantities not exceeding 200 bulbs each of narcissus and iris by any permittee in any one year. All such imported bulbs shall be given the latest approved hot-water treatment and shall be subject to such other regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, that bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and was before the Senate on the calendar for a considerable length of time, when, feeling that the committee had not made a sufficient investigation of the subject, I asked that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and a subcommittee be appointed to hold hearings opon the subject matter of the bill. The bill was recommitted, and the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry appointed a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] and the late beloved Senator from Iowa, Louis Murphy, who was killed a few months after the hearing was held. That committee held a hearing on the 17th of March 1936. Remember there were two questions involved, two statements made by the Department, two contentions made, justifying their discontinuance of this quarantine so far as these bulbs were concerned: first, that our own fields were so infested that they could not be helped by protection; and, second, that it would be possible to examine these bulbs at the port of entry and prevent the importation of infested bulbs.

Notification was given to the Department of Agriculture and a number of their representatives were present at the hearing. The man who was the head and is now the head of the Bureau, Dr. Strong, was present at the hearing as the official representative of the Department of Agriculture. There was presented to that committee-and I have here a copy of the hearings-uncontroverted evidence upon each of the two points. There was presented uncontroverted evidence to the effect that the statement made by the Department of Agriculture as to the infestation of our own fields was absolutely incorrect; that it had no basis in fact; that, as a result of the efforts of our own growers in this country, the fields of American producers of bulbs had been practically cleared of all infestation. That was presented by a number of witnesses from different parts of the country, and the Department made no effort to answer the testimony of those witnesses.

On the second point as to the possibility of inspection at the port of entry, I called upon the department to send to the committee the expert upon that particular subject. As a matter of fact, as the record shows, I did not even know the name of the man whom they were going to send. They sent a Dr. Steiner, who testified that he had spent his life studying the subject of the nematode known as the eelworm. He was a pure scientist. Without talking to him, I relied upon his opinion, knowing that if he was a scientist he would present to the committee the facts in the matter and would not be biased or prejudiced. Acting even without any preliminary introduction to Dr. Steiner, I called him to the stand before the subcommittee. He testified that without question it was absolutely impossible for him or for anyone else in the world to make an examination of bulbs to determine the presence or absence of eelworms without examining every bulb which might come into the port of entry and without actually cutting it open and making an examination by microscope and destroying each bulb.

That was the testimony presented by the department's own expert. I have found out since that Dr. Steiner is recognized throughout the scientific world as being one of the three or four leading authorities upon the question of the nematode eelworm. He has spent his life in that study. Dr. Steiner was born in Switzerland; he is a typical scientist. I tried to examine him about the flies. He said, "I do not know anything about the flies; I have spent my life studying the eelworms; that has been my life work; I am qualified to discuss that question, but I am not qualified to discuss any other question."

A short time ago when the Senator from Oregon and I were at the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Strong, the head of this Bureau, stated that they recognized that Dr. Steiner was probably the leading authority in the world upon that particular question, and, without any doubt, he established that it is impossible to inspect these bulbs at the port of entry. Before we concluded the hearing that morning we called upon Lee A. Strong, the head of the Bureau, to present a defense on the part of the Department of Agriculture. He testified for a few minutes, and then asked that he might go down to the Department, saying that he did not want to enter into any agreement without discussing the question with the Secretary.

We recessed the meeting that day until 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, at which time the committee reconvened. and Mr. Strong was there representing the Department. The net result of Mr. Strong's testimony in the afternoon was a recognition on his part that the Department could not make an inspection at the port of entry, and that in order to secure an agreement upon the part of the subcommittee that the bill continuing the quarantine would not be pushed further before the Senate they were willing to agree to install and insist upon a system whereby these bulbs might be sterilized before they were permitted to come into the country.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, without reading, the portion of the testimony before the subcommittee which I have marked on page 55 of the hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. Strong. The question was whether I would be willing to undertake to require the sterilization of all narcissus bulbs that were offered for entry, based on the understanding that it is not possible to guarantee freedom from infestation by nematode by ordinary visual inspection, such as would be made at the port.

I find that Secretary Wallace is out of town, but I have talked to the people in his office and also to my own people, and I am willing to require the sterilization of these bulbs that are being offered for entry. That would have to be done at such places as sterilization facilities could be made available, and where we would sterilization facilities could be made available, and where we would have inspection available for supervision: It would have to be done also at the expense and at the risk of the person who is importing the bulbs; that is, we could not be responsible for any deterioration of the bulb during the process of sterilization or following the process of sterilization. There is certain care that has to be given to these bulbs once they are sterilized, such as drying and so on, and that would have to be at the expense and at the full risk of the person importing the bulb. It would have to be done by the latest improved methods, and it may develop that the vapor or heat treatment is even more efficient than the that the vapor or heat treatment is even more efficient than the hot-water treatment.

Senator Schwellenbach. It is your present idea that the treatment that Dr. Steiner described is the best method?

Mr. Strong. Yes; we would adopt the treatment that is recommended by the Department.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President-

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield to the Senator from Arizona

Mr. ASHURST. I have listened to the remarks of the able Senator. It is obvious that he is not satisfied with the methods pursued in inspecting these bulbs. Am I correct?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am taking the position, as established by the hearing, that it is not possible to inspect the bulbs; that the only way in which they can be satisfactorily handled is by a process of sterilization, which was put into effect in 1936.

Mr. ASHURST. Before the bulbs are put into transit? Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. For more than a century we inspected immigrants after they reached our shores. Twenty years ago we found, however, that that was not effective; and we had our various consular officers abroad begin to look into the character of prospective immigrants through the visa system before they started for this country, which seems to me to be logical.

I desire to state that the Senator is doing a good work. We have a duty in Congress which we may not remit to others. The closest scrutiny should be applied not only to bulbs entering the United States bringing harmful insects, but there should also be a close scrutiny of animals brought into the United States. For example, for more than 15 years we have engaged in a contest to keep out beef and cattle from the Argentine, because they are largely afflicted with the hoofand-mouth disease. When the hoof-and-mouth disease begins to ravage our cattle, the losses are tremendous; and, with all the high-sounding praises of Argentine canned beef, I have pretty good authority for the statement that they can beef afflicted with foot-and-mouth disease.

The most rigid inspection of all bulbs, animals, plants, and all other things entering the United States should be conducted; and to immigrants seeking entry into the United States the same rule should be applied. I can well appreciate the Senator's solicitude, because I have said here before, and I say again, that there are 4,000,000 different kinds of insects in the world. They are all contestants for mankind's food supply. Scientific men tell us that it is a 50-50 question whether mankind or the insects shall ultimately inherit the food supplies of the earth.

If we are to survive, not only should we build up our armies and our navies, but the almost invisible insects which take mankind's food supply should be kept out of our country.

I congratulate the able Senator on demanding rigid inspection not only of bulbs but of cattle and of immigrants entering the United States.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Arizona for his remarks. I think to a slight extent he has mistaken the position which we must necessarily take upon this question. The record shows that it is impossible, even by the most rigid inspection, without destroying each one of the bulbs, to find out whether or not they are infested by this particular bug. What the Department now wants to do is to permit someone in Holland to do the inspecting, and put on the outside a certificate that the bulbs are all right, and then let them come into this country.

Mr. ASHURST. Then, that means that all of the bulbs may be sent here that anybody in Holland wishes to send.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I think there is no question; past history has shown that in Holland, when they wanted to send bulbs to this country before the Quarantine Act went into effect, they just handed out to the bulb producer a sufficient number of certificates, and he himself pasted them on the boxes; and the record during the past 2 years, when iris bulbs were permitted to come in without sterilization, shows that they have come in with the largest percentage of infestation ever known in this country. The infestation cannot be discerned by even the most rigid inspection; and all the testimony submitted by the Department of Agriculture bears out that statement.

At any rate, starting in 1936, the Department required the sterilization of all the bulbs which came into this country.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Where was this sterilization performed? Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It would be performed at the port of entry here.

Mr. ASHURST. Instead of at the point of origin of the

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Yes. We could not depend upon sterilization at the point of origin any more than we could depend upon inspection at the point of origin.

Last spring, at the request of the representative of the Government of Holland, our Department of Agriculture sent to Holland a committee consisting, as I understand, of three men, who went there to study whether or not the fields in Holland were actually infested. They were met by the authorities in Holland and taken to certain fields which had been selected by the authorities in Holland; and the committee found, upon inspecting these particular fields, that there was no infestation of them. Before they left, however, the two remaining members of the subcommittee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] and myself, sent to the Secretary of Agriculture a letter pointing out the fact that Congress was adjourning, that we were vitally interested in this subject as representatives of the States of Oregon and Washington, and that we had a responsibility in this connection because of the fact that we had been members of the subcommittee. On June 13, 1938, we sent to the Secretary of Agriculture a letter requesting that he take no action in reference to this subject until we returned to Washington in January of this year.

I will read the last paragraph of the letter. It says:

In view of the fact that we are leaving for our respective States within a few days and will not be in Washington, D. C., until January, we earnestly urge that if action is contemplated it be delayed until the next session of the Congress.

I ask unanimous consent to have the entire letter inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

JUNE 13, 1938.

HCn. HENRY A. WALLACE

Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As you may remember, in March 1936 the undersigned, with the late Senator Murphy, of Iowa, were appointed as a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to consider S. 2983, entitled "A bill to amend the Piant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912."

Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912."

On March 17, 1936, a hearing was held by our subcommittee at which testimony from a number of witnesses was received. A copy of that hearing was submitted to you on December 5, 1936. The results of that hearing were so conclusive as to the necessity of proper action to prevent the importation of infested narcissus bulbs that Dr. Lee A. Strong of your Department agreed to institute the present procedure for requiring sterilization.

We are now informed that a committee from your Department, headed by Dr. Strong, recently visited Holland for the purpose of

We are now informed that a committee from your Department, headed by Dr. Strong, recently visited Holland for the purpose of studying conditions there. We are not informed as to their findings or as to the nature of the report the committee will make. Nor do we know when such report will be made. However, in the light of the overwhelming testimony presented at the hearing in March 1936, we must respectfully insist that no action be taken which would alter the requirements agreed upon by Dr. Strong at the conclusion of that hearing without giving us and the narcissus-bulb industry in the country full opportunity to be heard.

In view of the fact that we are leaving for our respective States within a few days and will not be in Washington, D. C., until January, we earnestly urge that if action is contemplated it be delayed until the next session of the Congress.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES L. MCNARY. L. B. SCHWELLENBACH.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. A short time after that, each of us received from the Department of Agriculture a letter dated July 5, signed by Harry L. Brown, Acting Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

In view of your interest in this matter you may be assured that steps will be taken to insure your being notified as promptly as possible if the report of the committee indicates that there should be any modification of the present status regarding the importation of narcissus bulbs.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire letter be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Washington, July 5, 1938.

Hon. Lewis B. Schwellenbach,

United States Senate.

Dear Senator: Receipt is acknowledged of the letter dated June 13, jointly signed by yourself and Senator McNary, calling attention to the hearing held in 1936 by a subcommittee of which you were a member on the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forwere a member on the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to consider a bill to amend the Plant Quarantine Act of August 20, 1912. You also indicate that a committee from this Department headed by Dr. Lee A. Strong, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, recently visited Holland for the purpose of studying conditions there and you request that no action be taken which would alter the requirements agreed upon by Doctor Strong at the conclusion of the hearing previously referred to without giving you and the narcissus bulb industry in this country full opportunity to be heard. It is also noted that you desire any contemplated action be delayed until the next session of Congress. session of Congress

Under the provisions of article 10 of the trade agreement with the Netherlands Government the Minister of that country requested the appointment of a committee of technical experts repquestions the two Governments to consider the restrictions now governing the entry of narcissus bulbs from that country. Following this request Doctor Strong and two other members of the Department were selected to confer with Government officials of the Netherlands. The American members of this joint committee the Netherlands. The American members of this joint committee have returned to this country but a report of their observations has not as yet been made. When it is submitted it will be carefully considered. If the report should present a situation requiring a decision and if that decision should involve questions which merit or require public consideration such as might be had at a public hearing, adequate notice would be given in order that any who cared to might attend. Until the facts which may be developed by this report are available it is believed you will realize the Department could scarcely commit itself with respect to the appropriate time for holding such a hearing if one appears to be appropriate time for holding such a hearing if one appears to be necessary.

In view of your interest in this matter you may be assured that steps will be taken to insure your being notified as promptly as possible if the report of the committee indicates that there should be any modification of the present status regarding the importa-

Sincerely,

HARRY L. BROWN. Acting Secretary.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I do not believe anybody could have read those two letters and have construed them any differently than did the Senator from Oregon and I. Clearly we had requested, in view of our interest and our responsibility, that the Department give us ample opportunity to be heard before a change was made in the situation. That correspondence, taking into consideration the agreement which was made by the Department of Agriculture and the Senate on the 17th of March, 1936, in our opinion certainly placed upon the Department some responsibility for fair dealing toward the Senate and its Members in giving us an opportunity to present our side of the case before action was taken.

Having received the letter assuring us of that situation, we went home. We did nothing further about the matter. We had already given up, back in 1936, so far as that particular bill was concerned, the possibility of passing the proposed

I do not contend that the agreement of March 17, 1936, was a perpetual agreement, or that the Department of Agriculture was in perpetuity bound to keep that particular agreement in effect: but in view of the fact that the agreement was made with the Senate, and in view of the fact that the Acting Secretary of Agriculture specifically agreed that no action would be taken until we were given an opportunity to be heard, certainly there was a responsibility upon the Department not to take action until we had a chance to present our side of the case.

A few days after November 10, 1938, I received in Spokane a letter from Mr. Strong, the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Quarantine, in which he enclosed an order. I am not going to read them. I ask unanimous consent that both of them be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter and order are as follows:

Hon. Lewis B. Schwellenbach,

United States Senator,

Post-Office Box 16, Spokane, Wash.

Dear Senator: Herewith is an announcement of the revocation of the treatment requirement on noninfested Holland narcissus bulbs. It will be noted that this becomes effective on and after August 15, 1939.

Very truly yours,

LEE A. STRONG, Chief of Bureau.

[Enclosure]

B. E. P. Q.-482. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY AND PLANT QUARANTINE, Washington, D. C., November 10, 1938.

TREATMENT REQUIREMENT OF NONINFESTED HOLLAND NARCISSUS BULBS AS A CONDITION OF ENTRY, REVOKED

On January 14, 1935, as authorized in regulation 3, as revised on said date, of the rules and regulations supplemental to notice of quarantine No. 37, the announcement was made that on and after December 15, 1936, narcissus bulbs would be authorized entry under permit in unlimited numbers for any purpose, subject to inspection and certification in the country of origin and reinspection at the part of antry in the Hulted States with the understooding that and certification in the country of origin and reinspection at the port of entry in the United States with the understanding that any shipments found to be infested would be rejected. At the same time, revocation of the domestic narcissus bulb quarantine No. 62 was announced, effective April 1, 1935.

On August 1, 1936, in accordance with the authority contained in regulation 9 of said notice of quarantine No. 37, it was further announced that, as a condition of entry, the treatment of narcissus bulbs would be required, since external examination of these bulbs could not be relied upon to determine their freedom from infestation by the bulb nematode, Ditylenchus dipsaci. Those in interest were informed in a circular issued September 16, 1936, of the "latest approved treatment" to be employed with respect to all entries of narcissus bulbs.

Since it was a matter of record that imported and domestic bulbs entries of narcissus bulbs.

Since it was a matter of record that imported and domestic bulbs other than narcissus were known hosts of the bulb nematode, a conference was held in Washington on December 15, 1936, to consider the desirability of treating all known hosts of the bulb nematode enterable under the nursery stock, plant, and seed quarantine No. 37. The following day, December 16, 1936, a hearing was held to consider the advisability of establishing a domestic plant quarantine for the purpose of requiring the treatment of narcissus bulbs and other known hosts of the bulb nematode as a prerequisite to interstate shipment. On February 15, 1937, it was announced that the evidence presented at the conference in question indicated that the bulb nematode risk which accompanies the importation of most ornamental bulbs which have been inspected in the country of origin, supplemented by inspection at the port of entry in the United States, does not justify the requirement that all known hosts of this nematode be treated as a condition of entry. No change in the requirements as to importation of narcissus bulbs was announced at that time. While no public announcement has been made with reference to the conclusion reached as the result of the hearing on December 16, 1936, no Federal domestic quarantine has been promulgated requiring the treatment of narcissus bulbs and other known hosts of the bulb nematode as a condition of interstate shipment.

At the requirement, of interstate shipment.

At the request of the Netherlands Government a committee of technical experts representing the Governments of the Netherlands and of this country was appointed for the purpose of considering on the ground in Holland the necessity of requiring the hot-water treatment of Holland narcissus bulbs as a condition of entry into the United States. This committee held a series of meetings in Holland during the month of April 1938, most of which took place in the narcissus-bulb fields, where every opportunity was afforded to inspect the bulbs as to foliage or by lifting them, and to observe the cultural practices and sanitary measures employed in an effort to reduce the bulb nematode infestation to the minimum. The field examinations revealed an almost complete absence of bulb nematode infestations in the narcissus plantings. In view of this condition and the sanitary measures practiced, which involve repeated field examinations during the growing season, supplemented by inspection and certification of the bulbs at the time of shipment, it is evident, so long as the above conditions exist, that the bulb nematode risk incident to the importation of Holland narcissus bulbs does not justify the continuation of the requirement that all importations of these bulbs be given the hot-water treatment as a condition of entry. This requirement therefore will not be in effect on and after August 15, 1939. On and after that date, all such importations, in accordance with the provisions of regulation 7 of the nursery stock, plant, and seed quarantine No. 37, shall be accompanied by a certificate certifying that the bulbs have been thoroughly inspected at the time of packing and found or believed to be free of injurious plant diseases and insect pests. Finally, upon arrival at the American ports of entry, all shipments will be examined by inspectors of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, and this examination will include the cutting of suspicious-looking bulbs when necessary to determine their freedom from infestation by the bulb nematode. Any shipments found to be infested will be given the latest approved treatment or rejected.

Lee A. Straone,

Chief, Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The letter simply was a transmittal of the order. The order provided that the agreement made on March 17, 1936, was rescinded, and that the requirement for sterilization would not be made after the 15th of August of this year.

We came back here in January. I first had a meeting with Mr. Strong. I then had a meeting with the Secretary of Agriculture. Then the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNary] and I had a meeting with both the Secretary of Agriculture and Mr. Strong. In all of the meetings we took the position that, so far as the record was concerned, all of the testimony showed that it was not possible to prevent the importation of infested bulbs without the use of the sterilization process.

All we asked from the Department of Agriculture was an opportunity to present our case, an opportunity to be heard, an opportunity to know directly and definitely what this committee found out, an opportunity to see the report of the committee, an opportunity to represent our constituents on the one hand, and an opportunity to represent the Senate, with which an agreement had been made, on the other hand.

We were denied that opportunity, and we were told, in place of that, that the Department had prepared a bill which would take care of everything; that we did not need to worry about it; that Mr. Strong had prepared a bill which covered the whole question of the plant quarantine. He explained to us that there was a necessity for amendment of the entire act; that it was cumbersome and difficult to administer; that he wanted the whole subject taken up at one time; and that if we would agree to let this legislation go over, all of our problems would be solved, and the Department would be in much better position.

Frankly, we were not satisfied with that. We wanted an opportunity to be heard upon the specific question involved, but not having that opportunity, we had to agree to the alternative, and sometime prior to February 16 of this year, on behalf of the Department of Agriculture, requests were made of Members of the House of Representatives and Members of the Senate that the Department's bill upon this question be introduced. The result was that Representative Boykin introduced a bill in the House and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] on February 16 of this year introduced Senate bill 1364.

The Senator from Oregon and I, very rightly, I think, assumed that since the Department had offered the bill, since it was their solution of this problem, we had a right to rely upon the cooperation of the Department in getting the bill through the Congress. The Members of this body know that when a Department comes and offers a bill and asks a Member of Congress to introduce it, and the bill is all prepared and handed to him, he introduces it, it goes to a committee, the committee sends the bill to the Department, and in 9 out of 10 cases it is only a matter of a few days before a favorable report on the bill is sent back to the Congress by the department.

The bill in question was introduced on February 16, and on February 22 the clerk of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body sent the Bankhead bill, Senate bill 1364, back to the Department, and asked for a report upon it. I waited a couple of weeks and did not hear anything about it, and then started calling up from my own office to find where the report was. I was not able to ascertain; so I went to the clerk of the committee, and he started a daily process of calling the Department in an attempt to discover why the Department had not made a report to the Senate upon its own bill, a bill which it had prepared, which it had had introduced, and which it asked the Senator from Oregon and me to rely upon as a solution of our particular problem, and as carrying out the agreement which was made in 1936 with the Senate subcommittee, and made with the Senator from Oregon and me in June of last year.

It was not possible to get a report upon the department's bill from the department until May 16. The time from February 22 to May 16 passed before they made a report upon this particular piece of legislation.

When the report came in, we found that the department, which had told us that they were going to keep their agreement with the Senate and with us through the medium of this piece of legislation, namely, recommended to the Senate that all parts of the proposed legislation which referred to our particular problem should be eliminated from the bill; and they just struck out those paragraphs.

Mr. President, this is the 7th of June. I do not know, and I do not think even the able leaders on both sides of the Senate have any particular knowledge, as to just when the present session of Congress will adjourn, but it is certain that it is not going to be possible to get through at this stage of the proceedings a piece of legislation protecting this particular situation when it will meet, as apparently it will, the violent opposition of the Department of Agriculture and the chief of the Bureau of Inspection and Plant Quarantine.

Mr. President, I shall not ask that all of Senate bill 1364 be printed in the Record, but I do ask unanimous consent that section 3 of the bill be printed in the Record at this point as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?
There being no objection, the section was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

SEC. 3. That, in order to safeguard agriculture in the manner and for the purposes set forth in section 1 of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person to import, or offer for importation, from a foreign country into the United States or into any Territory or District thereof, any plants or plant products capable of propagation, as defined in section 2 of this act (1) unless a permit therefor shall have been issued by the Secretary of Agriculture; (2) unless the requirements applicable to the importation of such plants or plant products, prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to this act, including inspection and, when necessary, treatment to prevent the introduction of plant pests, have been complied with, including the best approved treatment for nematodes applied to all importations of narcissus and iris bulbs; and (3) unless such plants or plant products are imported for propagation for the purpose of establishing production to meet domestic requirements and after importation are utilized therefor under the surveillance of the Secretary of Agriculture for such time and under such conditions as the said Secretary may prescribe in order that he may be able to determine, by inspection or otherwise, whether such plants or plant products are apparently free from plant pests: Provided, That, when the Secretary of Agriculture finds that the importation of such plants or plant products is desired for processing in some manner not involving propagation, and is of the opinion that the proposed processing will destroy, or render innocuous, any plant pests that might be present in or on such plants or plant products, the said Secretary may issue a permit specifying the conditions for the importation of such plants or plant products and may prescribe such conditions for the proposed processing as he may deem necessary effectively to destroy or render innocuous any possible plant pests thereon or therein: Provided further, That plants or plant products may be imported for experimental or scientific or non

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I now desire to read from a portion of the report of the Secretary of Agriculture referring to that particular section:

In the same section—section 3—page 4, lines 3, 4, and 5, the phrase "including the best approved treatment for nematodes applied to all importations of narcissus and iris bulbs" should be removed from the bill. When a given lot of plants or plant products capable of propagation arrives in this country from abroad, representatives of the Department would first determine whether a permit had been issued and what requirements applicable to that particular importation had been prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, including determination whether the contents of the importation were the subject of a specific quarantine. Inspection of these contents would follow in due course, and the subsequent action taken with respect to a given importation should depend on the results of the inspection. If pests or diseases were to be found which were not known to exist in this country, consideration should be given as to whether that importation should be excluded. If the nature of the infestation or infection were such that treatment and admittance were deemed safe, the treatment might be prescribed but to the the hands of the Department by requiring a treatment for a given type of plant or plant product capable of propagation regardless of the findings of the inspection is discriminatory, unwise, and might result in prescribing a treatment which would not be effective in destroying the organism in question, because this organism might whether a permit had been issued and what requirements applidestroying the organism in question, because this organism might be one new to the Department, the treatment for which is unknown.

Mr. President, in the light of the record, this statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, in the first place, the Department, going back to the old position they took in January 1933, saying that they would be able to make inspection at the port of entry, despite the fact that the entire record as presented shows that they cannot make such an inspection; then saying that, because it is provided that a particular type of sterilization shall be used, it would tie the hands of the Department, and would be unwise and unjust and would be discrimination, that there might be other nematodes about which they do not know, is just simply begging the question, and, so far as I am concerned, I believe that it is merely trifling with the Senate of the United States.

Remember, this language which the Secretary of Agriculture so drastically condemns is the language which Mr. Strong, of the Bureau of Inspection and Plant Quarantine, wrote into the bill. We did not write the bill; the Department itself wrote it. They included this provision because of the fact that we went to the Department insisting upon some sort of a hearing before the Department, insisting upon a right to be heard, insisting that they present some evidence which would controvert the evidence which we had heard in 1936. We became so insistent that they said. "All right; we will present a bill which will take care of the whole situation." Then they held up the report from the 22d of February until the 16th of May, too late in the session for us to get any possible action upon a controversial question; then they recommended that the part of the bill which was put in under their representation and which we could rely upon be removed, and they criticized that portion of their own bill as being unwise, unjust, and discriminatory.

If the Secretary of Agriculture and Mr. Strong, of the Bureau of Inspection and Plant Quarantine thought it was unwise, unjust, and discriminatory to include that provision in the bill in May 1939, why did they tell the Senator from Oregon and me in January 1939 that they would put it in, and that we could rely upon it, and that we would be protected by it?

As I stated in the beginning, this is not merely a question of a few bulb growers in the State of Washington and in the State of Oregon, though it is of supreme importance to them, and it is of supreme importance generally to know that the fields of this country will not be infested by this nematode, which is described as one which rapidly spreads, not merely to bulbs, but to all forms of plant life; this matter also involves the question as to what sort of treatment the Senate of the United States and the Members of the Senate of the United States are entitled to at the hands of the executive department of the Government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to offer at this time, and have lie upon the table, a resolution on behalf of the Senator from Oregon and myself, and I ask that the resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be received and read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 143), as follows:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to be appointed by the chairman of the committee, is authorized and directed to examine the Secretary of Agriculture and Dr. Lee A. Strong, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, with respect to the following matters:

Why the Department of Agriculture failed to keep the agree-(1) Why the Department of Agriculture failed to keep the agree-ment made with the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, acting on behalf of the Senate, on March 17, 1936, providing for the necessary sterilization of the bulbs imported into the United States, which were described in Senate bill No. S. 2983, Seventy-fourth which were described in Senate bill No. S. 2565, Seventy-Louisian Congress, first session.

TIME LIMITATION FOR RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMEND-MENTS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, five different amendments proposed by the Congress may, by the effect of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered on June 5, 1939, in the case of Coleman et al. against Miller et al., be assumed to be pending before the States for their action. These amendments are as follows:

One proposed September 29, 1789, 150 years ago, relating to enumeration and representation:

ARTICLE I. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be 1 Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Another, proposed September 29, 1789, 150 years ago, relating to compensation of Members of Congress:

ARTICLE II. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Another, proposed January 12, 1810, 129 years ago, to prohibit citizens of the United States from accepting presents, pensions, or titles from princes or from foreign powers:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Another, proposed March 2, 1861, 78 years ago, known as the Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State (12 Stat, 251).

And still another, proposed June 2, 1924, 15 years ago, the child-labor amendment:

SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

SEC. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the

On September 29, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were proposed by the First Congress. The requisite number of States ratified proposed articles Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 within 2 years and 3 months, while Nos. 1 and 2, although proposed 150 years ago, have not, according to the latest available returns, received favorable action by the requisite number of States and are still before the American people, or the States, rather, and are now subject to ratification or rejection by the States. After those two proposed amendments, to wit, Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubilous-in the clouds-for 84 years, the Ohio State Senate in 1873, in response to a tide of indignation that swept over the land in opposition to the so-called back-salary grab, resurrected proposed amendment No. 2 and passed a resolution of ratification through the State senate. No criticism can be visited upon the Ohio Legislature that attempted to ratify the amendment proposed in 1789; and if the amendment had been freshly proposed by Congress at the time of the backsalary grab, instead of having been drawn forth from musty tomes, where it had so long lain stale and dormant, other States doubtless would have ratified it during the period from 1873 to 1881.

During the present year-indeed, within the past 90 daysthe States of Massachusetts, Georgia, and Connecticut, respectively, have ratified articles 3 to 12, both inclusive, of the 12 articles proposed 150 years ago.

We should not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a nebulous haze which a State here may resurrect and ratify and a State there may galvanize and ratify.

We ought to have homogeneous, steady, united exertion, and certainly we should have contemporaneous action with reference to proposed amendments. Judgment on the case should be rendered within the lifetime of those interested in bringing about the change in our fundamental law. Final action should be had while the discussions and arguments are within the remembrance of those who are called upon to act.

The amendment proposed on January 12, 1810, was submitted to the States in peculiar auspices.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remarks of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country."

What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous and his marriage to a Maryland lady may have suggested this

An article in Niles' Register, volume 72, page 166, written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles' relate to the passage through Congress of this amendment. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. The Federalists thought the Democrats would oppose the amendment as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subserviency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment.

"It can do no harm" was what reconciled all to the amendment.

That amendment was submitted by Congress 129 years ago, and after the space of about 2 years it was ratified by 12 States, but not a sufficient number of States at that time to make up the necessary three-fourths required for ratification. At one period of our national life the histories and the public men announced that it was a part of our organic law, and this error arose because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress announcing ratification and did not promulgate any notice as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there may not be found any notice of any proclamation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The States assumed-it was not an unwarranted or violent assumption—that when the requisite number of States had ratified an amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law.

Thus we perceive that a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may be voted upon by the States is not fair to posterity or to the present generation. Lack of time limitation keeps historians, publishers, and analysts, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

It would seem that Congress had, within the past 20 years, become aware of the wisdom of limiting the time within which a State may ratify, inasmuch as Congress attached to the eighteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first amendments a limitation of the time within which a State might ratify.

CONFISCATION OF FIREARMS IN POSSESSION OF PERSONS CONVICTED OF FELONY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 189), to provide for the confiscation of firearms in possession of persons convicted of felony and disposition thereof, which was, beginning with line 3, to strike out all down to and including "tried", in line 7, and

That when any person is convicted in any court of the United States of any of the crimes of murder, manslaughter, felonious assault, rape, killing, or assaulting a Federal officer, robbery, burglary, bank robbery, killing, or kidnaping in committing a bank robbery or in avoiding or attempting to avoid apprehension for the commission of bank robbery or in freeing one's self or attempting to free one's self from arrest or confinement for bank robbery, transporting or causing to be transported a kidnaped person in interporting or causing to be transported a kamapet person in inter-state or foreign commerce, transporting or causing to be trans-ported a stolen motor vehicle in interstate or foreign commerce, or any felony perpetrated in whole or in part by the use of firearms, or an attempt to commit any of the foregoing crimes, the court in its judgment of conviction may, in addition to the penalty or penalties prescribed by law for the punishment of such crime or crimes, order the confiscation and disposal of firearms and ammunition found in the possession or under the immediate control of such person at the time of his arrest.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT OF 1937

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAFT obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me so I may suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas for that purpose?

Mr. TAFT. Yes; I yield. Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I should like to return from the pleasant fields of tulips, narcissus, and constitutional amendments to discuss the bill before the Senate, relating to the extension of power of the United States Housing Authority to issue bonds. In that connection I should like to offer the amendment which lies on the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 5, in the committee amendment, after the words "more than" it is proposed to strike out "$45,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$30,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the committee amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, there is another amendment on page 3 which should be considered in connection with the amendment just stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 13, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out "$800,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio ask unanimous consent that the two amendments which he has offered to the committee amendment be considered as one?

Mr. TAFT. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not want in any way to oppose or to be understood as opposing the general housing policy embodied in the present United States Housing Authority Act. I think the Federal Government is definitely interested in the subject of housing and should be interested. We have passed three entirely different measures intended to stimulate housing. The first is the Federal Home Loan bill, by which it is proposed that the Federal Government shall assist building and loan associations in lending money for the development of private housing. The second is the Federal Housing Authority bill, which has to do with the insuring of loans on private houses. The third is the United States Housing Authority bill which provides low-rent Government housing.

A wise housing policy is essential to recovery. I think there is more opportunity for recovery and for putting men to work in the development of the industry of housing than in probably any other single industry which could be developed. We are behind in provisions for housing. The subject of housing is one in which the Federal Government can and properly should interest itself.

While excellent work has been done in each of the three fields mentioned, there has been no coordination whatever in those three fields, and no consideration of the whole problem at one time. We have a number of independent Government agencies. We have the Federal Housing Authority, which is entirely independent; we have the United States Housing Authority, which is in the Department of the Interior; and we have the Federal home-loan bank, which is an independent agency. The problem has not been considered as a whole. The activity in each field is still in an experimental stage, and in no case in more of an experimental stage than in the business of providing low-rent Government housing. The United States Housing Authority has not yet opened a single project which has been constructed under its supervision.

This bill deals only with low-rent Government housing. There has been a great deal of discussion of what the policy is. I think the policy should be stated in order that it may be clearly understood. In the first place, we have heretofore authorized $800,000,000 in bonds and $28,000,000 in subsidies. The Administrator has gone ahead and allotted about $650,-000,000 of the $800,000,000, and he has $150,000,000 left. Then he ran out of subsidy money, so he could not issue the remaining $150,000,000 in bonds. What he is asking authority for is to issue eight hundred additional million dollars, so that he would have available at once $950,000,000 in addition to what has been allotted; and he is asking for additional subsidies of $45,000,000. Thirty-four million dollars of that is needed to provide subsidies for the new $800,000,000; approximately four and a half million dollars is to subsidize the P. W. A. projects which we are going to turn over to the local housing authorities; about six and a half million dollars is to finance the $150,000,000 which he has not as yet been able to use, making a total of $45,000,000.

The amendment which I propose cuts down the $800,000,000 to $400,000,000, and cuts down the $45,000,000 to $30,000,000, which would enable him to cover the $150,000,000 which he has not used, plus the $400,000,000 new amount, plus the P. W. A. projects. That is the reason why, instead of cutting the $45,000,000 in half, I am proposing only to cut the $45,000,000 to $30,000,000.

He proposes to house 180,000 families with $800,000,000. In other words, the estimate of the Administrator is that the average cost per family will be $4,500. That is his estimate, and I think we may accept that as the present average cost of housing under this particular plan.

Under the policy the United States Housing Authority issues $800,000,000 of bonds which are guaranteed as to principal and interest by the United States Government. Then they take that $800,000,000 and lend it to the various local housing authorities, public bodies created by the various States. They can lend to them 90 percent of the cost of those projects. On those loans they charge 3 percent interest and one-half percent amortization, and they take 60-year bonds from the local housing authorities at 3 percent interest. The subsidy is 31/2 percent on the entire cost. 90 percent plus 10 percent; that subsidy goes to the local housing authorities, and then it is used to pay the interest and the sinking fund on their own bonds. There can be no question that that process is practically equivalent to our constructing the buildings and presenting them to the local housing authorities for nothing; practically as if we issued the bonds and then erected the buildings and turned them over without any recourse; in fact, in some ways, that might be a safer plan, because there is a possibility of loss under the other plan. If one cares to look at it from the standpoint of a subsidy, it means that the Federal Government is subsidizing every family that lives in these buildings to the extent of $158 per family per year. The $158 per family per year subsidy means, in effect, that no man who lives in one of these low-rent houses pays one cent of rent attributable to the cost of construction or the repayment of the loan or the interest on the cost of the construction. All that he pays in rent is the maintenance cost of the building. The remainder of it is subsidized.

There is, to some extent, an additional subsidy. I rather agree with the Senator from Louisiana that the States do put up some subsidy in the form of remitting taxes. I do not know what that amounts to; but I think to at least $40 a family. So I should say that we are subsidizing low-income families to the extent of $200 per family per year. That is the effect of this particular policy.

There is not any investment, because the Government could not get anything from these buildings if it got them back. The rental that comes in is going to pay only for the maintenance of the building. There is no investment, for there is no return. We pay the local housing authorities in the form of subsidies money which they turn around and pay back on the interest and sinking fund on the bonds. It is perfectly clear that that is the purpose, because the act itself provides that payments under annual contribution contracts shall be pledged as security for any loans obtained by a public housing agency to assist the development of a housing project to which the annual contributions relate.

Then it is provided that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of all annual contributions. So there is no question that the subsidy payments are used to finance the projects.

The local housing authority issues 90 percent of their bonds to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government may perhaps sell those bonds. The local housing authority issues 10 percent to private bankers or other individuals, and to those the faith of the United States is pledged. We are going to continue these subsidy payments so that they can pay interest on the bonds. So, in my opinion, there is not any doubt of the soundness of the argument of the Senator from Maryland that, in effect, we are erecting these buildings and are presenting them to the States or to the local housing authorities. The effect of that is a subsidy of possibly $200 per family per year.

What interested me in the hearings before the subcommittee was the question whether anybody had considered how far we are going in carrying out this policy. How many families do we propose to house? Each $800,000,000 will house from 180,000 to 200,000 families. The Administrator finally testified that he would like to provide about four and a half million families with this kind of Government housing. That would mean a total cost to the Federal Government before we got through with the program, if that is the program, of approximately $20,000,000,000, which is half of the present national debt. The Administrator thought it might take 15 years to carry out that program. By the time we got through, we would have an annual housing subsidy of about $600,000,000 a year, although the amount might vary.

I think that the Housing Authority has done a good job. I think it is reducing the cost of housing projects. There are various indications that as the more modern ones are built, as greater information in regard to building is obtained, the costs are brought down.

Mr. Rheinstein, head of the New York Housing Authority, has particularly made progress in reducing the cost of housing in New York State under the Housing Act, and I think there is reasonable hope that costs may be reduced and this subsidy may ultimately be not quite so large; yet I think, looking at the program, the figures I have given would seem to be approximately the program of the United States Housing Administrator.

Personally I do not agree with him. I do not think that we need to house four and a half million families in Government apartment houses. I think that a complete survey of the whole field, which I believe ought to be made, would show that we do not have to take that proportion of the low-rent families and put them into Government houses. Certainly I would be very doubtful of the advisability of that program. It seems to me that a policy of developing individual homes would be much better for a very considerable number of that large group of low-income families.

We are referred to the English policy. In England since the World War there has probably been the greatest building boom that any country has ever had in a similar time. In England about 4,000,000 homes have been built during that time: and when we consider that in this country we have nearly three times the population of England, it can be seen what it would mean if we should proceed along this line on the same scale as that adopted in England. It would mean the construction of approximately 11,000,000 homes in this country. Home construction work is one of the things that have kept England going, but of the 4,000,000, only about 1,000,000 have been provided by Government housing projects; the other 3,000,000 have been provided through building society financing entirely independent of any government policy whatsoever. The English, on the basis of a million homes, now have a subsidy, I think, of 15,000,000 pounds a year, or $75,000,000. For that they have housed a million families. A subsidy of $73,000,000, which is the total this bill now provides, will only house something like 500,000 families, or one-half, for approximately the same amount. So far as I can figure, our subsidy is about twice what the English subsidy is, and I do not believe the Government housing in this country is proportionately as necessary as it is in England. England is a much more urbanized and much more industrial country than is the United States today, and I believe that we do not need to follow the English proportion. I think probably, if we reach 2,000,000 families instead of four and a half million, that might be a reasonable proportion in providing for the people who need this particular kind

I say again I think the Housing Administration is doing a good job. I only feel they have not looked ahead; they have not a comprehensive plan. I do not think the Federal Government knows where it is going; I do not think they know how much private housing they hope to stimulate; and I do not think they have considered all the difficulties that may arise.

I have a good deal of criticism of the Housing Authority's propaganda, if it may be called that. It seems to me that a great many of the arguments that are presented are completely unnecessary, so far as logic is concerned. For instance, one of the arguments is that the requests are received from all sections of the country. This is Mr. Straus' testimony:

And gentlemen, from all sections of the country, requests have been received for additional earmarkings. The distribution of these requests proves both the need for low-rent housing and slum clearance and the enthusiasm of the cities and towns throughout the Nation seeking to join or continue in the U. S. H. A. program of slum clearance and rehousing. Despite the early announcement by the U. S. H. A. that all funds currently available have been exhausted, additional earmarking requests already received total in excess of $800,000,000, and more requests are being received each day.

Of course, in a general way they are getting something for nothing, and, of course, the people who are so enthusiastic are not always mayors; they are the people who are particularly interested in housing and want to see the projects carried through; and the mere fact that they are willing to take a gift from the Federal Government is certainly no evidence that the Federal Government ought to make that gift.

As a matter of fact, there are a good many cities which are getting doubtful about participating in this program simply on account of the tax exemption. In Cincinnati we have a large project which has general approval, but it has eliminated a very substantial amount of the taxes which the city government is able to collect. It means, of course, that to a large extent the persons who own their own homes are going to have to pay the taxes of the persons who live in these apartments and do not pay any taxes; and while I think we would support one more project with interest and enthusiasm, beyond that we would soon get to a point where the burden on the other taxpayers would be so heavy that they would not be willing to assume the additional burden. I do not think the argument that some local people want the projects is necessarily a sound argument.

Mr. Straus testified that-

The $800,000,000 increased authorization is merely an authorization to us to borrow that sum, that it is entirely and fully repayable, with interest, and does not affect the public debt, nor would it be included in the public debt.

It is, however, an unqualified obligation of the United States Government, and I do not see why it is not an addition to the public debt. As I have already explained, the only difference is that instead of having to pay interest on it, we have to pay these subsidies to the Housing Authority, and we enter into a binding contract to pay the subsidies for 60 years, whereas if we issue our own bonds we at least can call them from time to time, take advantage of lower rates of interest, and adjust the interest in such a way as to be less of a burden. So I say that not only is this obligation in substance a debt, but it is a more burdensome debt than it would be to issue our bonds in the same amount.

Another argument advanced by the Administrator is as follows:

I am convinced that the rents in the U.S. H. A. projects will be the lowest achieved in recent times for decent housing, public or private. The paramount objective of the act is to provide homes which will be rented at a figure so low that they will be available to families in the lowest income groups.

Mr. President, private individuals can build homes just as cheap as these homes. Private industry today can build homes at $1,000 a room, and that is substantially what these homes cost. The only reason why the Administrator is able to supply low-rent housing is simply because we subsidize the housing. If we should subsidize private individuals in their homes they could get just as low rent as the United States Housing Authority is giving. There is a constant flood of propaganda on this subject which seems to me to misrepresent the facts and prevent an intelligent consideration of what our real policy should be.

In that connection I should like to read a statement by Mr. Paul Mallon which appeared in the newspapers of June 1. He says:

A New Deal annual award of a nut-indented cooky for the outstanding propaganda of the year will undoubtedly be voted to the U.S. H. A. without a dissenting vote among the Government

Up until last Friday there might have been some doubt. Then the United States Housing Authority gave to a waiting world (one-third ill-housed) release No. 298. It is a beautifully written account of what an excellent job U. S. H. A. is doing, tersely condensed to 78 mimeographed pages. Not the least of its innovations was the omission of numbering from its pages, so that no one could tell how many pages were in it unless he sat down and counted each one.

The other prizeworthy feature of the massive handout was a larger omission. Nowhere in it can you find out how many dollars have actually been spent in clearing slums. Figures there are galore, bright big figures * * * "$27,514,000 additional loans approved for 19 cities." * * "This makes $434.653,000 in loan contracts." * * "Earmarkings are $225,385,000." * * * "Grand total of $660,038,000 in commitments." You may mark your ear or pull it off but you still will not find out how many slum dwellers now have better homes.

The unannounced truth of it is that the grand total of $660,-000,000 of commitments includes about $225,000,000 which has merely been set aside for use of certain cities if they want it. The remaining $435,000,000 represents specific agreements with cities which may or may not cancel them.

Actual total of money spent up to the other day was a measly $37,000,000.

I think Mr. Mallon understates the amount actually spent, but only $100,000,000 of bonds has yet been issued.

Quite an argument is made in favor of the employment of men in these housing projects. I can only say that the employment of men in private housing ought to be three or four times as important as this particular employment; and, of course, this is not a relief measure. For every man on the job in these housing projects the cost to the Government is about $6,000 a year, which, of course, is away beyond any question of relief. If we include the men who are supposed to be working in producing the materials, the cost will amount to about $2,250 for every man who is given any kind of a job. Of course, that is about three times as expensive as relief, so it is not really relief at all but low-rent housing construction.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. TAFT. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. Would the Senator suggest that we do not pay the prevailing rate of wage, and in that manner reduce the cost?

Mr. TAFT. Not at all. I am only suggesting that this housing policy is not a relief policy. It is not a policy which is going to stimulate employment, except as any public-works policy is desirable in hard times.

There are several other methods of providing housing. We have the F. H. A. This year we have authorized the F. H. A. to insure a billion dollars more of contracts. We have the building and loan associations, which I think under proper stimulation and assistance from the Government, and a more friendly attitude toward the Federal home-loan bank on the part of the administration might do what the building and loan associations are doing in England, where they have built 3,000,000 homes in a very short time.

I do not suggest that we should abandon the low-rent housing policy. I only say that it includes things which have not been adequately considered. Must we subsidize rents as much as $200 per family per year? Is that amount of subsidy really necessary in order to take care of the lower-income groups? Have we considered the question of the relative position of persons who buy their own homes?

A man buys his own home, and he has to put up the money to pay the interest and sinking fund on the construction cost. He has to pay the taxes, $40 every year. Right alongside of him a man comes and lives in one of these Government houses and does not have to put up a cent for interest, amortization, or taxes. If we are going to subsidize, why subsidize only low-rent housing projects? Why not subsidize people to build their own homes as well as people who live in apartment houses?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WAGNER. Can the Senator conceive of a family having an income of only four, five, or six hundred dollars a year being able to purchase their own home and amortize the debt?

The reason why we are providing subsidies, as I know the Senator appreciates, is because the families for whom we are providing have such low incomes that they cannot live in decent homes and pay out of their incomes the rent which private industry would exact. We are either going to take them out of the slums and give them a chance in life through a subsidy or else they will have to remain in the slums.

Mr. TAFT. I want to say to the Senator that I am not questioning the fact that we are going to have to grant a subsidy of some size; but I am asking, Is this the proper way to grant the subsidy? Might we not also subsidize persons to live in their own homes, subsidize them in private housing? The point I am trying to make, as the Senator understands, is that this whole policy seems to me to be so doubtful, there are so many questions involved in it that have not been solved, that we ought to go slowly until we are able to conduct some kind of investigation to determine what should be done to coordinate these different activities of Government. Persons from one of these three activities have appeared before our committee criticizing the policy of one of the others. You may talk to the U.S. H. A. people, and while they are friendly to the F. H. A., they are inclined to poohpooh it. If you talk to representatives of the F. H. A., you find that they are pretty doubtful about the U.S. H. A.; and the Federal home-loan bank is doubtful of both. So my suggestion is that there are so many different questions which have not been solved, there is so little coordination in the policy, there has been so little thinking out of the housing policy, that we ought to go slowly until we have developed a definite program.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. TAFT. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. The policy which was originally adopted in 1937 is a policy and a pattern which has been adopted by other countries which have had years of experience in taking care of persons in the very low income group, particularly England. They have done a great deal more than we have done.

Mr. TAFT. But I have tried to point out to the Senator that for approximately the same amount of money the English are going to house a million families, whereas we are housing only 500,000.

Mr. WAGNER. Our limitation on a subsidy contribution by the Federal Government is $3\frac{1}{2}$ percent. England goes as high as 5 and 6 percent in some cases.

Mr. TAFT. And yet the total English subsidy is $75,000,-000, which houses a million families. After this program is carried out we are going to have a subsidy of $73,000,000 for 500,000 families; so the English subsidy is approximately one-half the American subsidy.

I want to say further to the Senator that I recognize the principle of subsidy. We have gotten into such a condition that we must recognize that there are people with incomes of less than a thousand dollars who must receive certain forms of relief. We have adopted a policy of giving them direct relief; we have adopted a policy of giving them work relief; we have adopted a policy of spending Federal money in providing old-age pensions for them. We already have done subsidizing to some extent, in providing health service, and now in this matter we are subsidizing housing service. Those policies have been adopted, and I am in favor of continuing them. No matter how prosperous we get, whether we succeed in putting back to work the 12,000,000 people who are out of work today, I think we are still going to have many people earning less than enough to live on decently, because there are so many jobs in this country the products of which, under any economic system I know of, simply are not worth the money they would have to bring to enable those who produce them to maintain the American standard of living; and a certain number of people are going to have to carry on in that kind of jobs. It is not possible to persuade the rest of the people to pay for those products more than the products are worth, and there will always be that group of low-income people.

I believe in the general policy of helping those people, of subsidizing them, if you please, so that they will to some extent receive an equivalent which will bring them up to the decent standard of living that is necessary. But in this housing authority business, the subsidy program is so extremely expensive, it is so doubtful how far we are to go, there are so many questions to be solved. Why should a few low-income people, why should 500,000 low-income families receive, under this type of legislation, governmental subsidy and housing, and 9,500,000 other families not get any such assistance at all?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. In the relief field, for instance, we help everyone who is in need. Here is a policy which is taking care of but a little piece out of the entire field of need.

Mr. WAGNER. I recognize the fact, of course, and we have asserted it over and over again, that we cannot anywhere near take all of the slum dwellers out of the slums and give them decent places in which to live; but is that any reason for not doing what we can to eliminate the evil? We are told now that we could save $10,000,000,000 a year if we would give medical care to those who need it and cannot have it now. Because we cannot take care of all of them, should we cease taking care of some? We have the same problem in connection with the pending legislation. If we cannot cover all those who need assistance, let us do the very best we can. The Senator seems to be stating in one breath that we are not doing enough because we are not taking care of all these people, and then in his very amendment he cuts the amount down so that we can do even less than is proposed under the pending legislation.

Mr. TAFT. My reason for wanting to cut it down is that I do not think the policy has been sufficiently considered; I do not think we have looked where it is we are going. The Senator is quite right, if we are to house 500,000 low-rent families we ought to be prepared to step in and house all of the low-income families who are entitled to the same relief this 500,000 will get. But before we do that, let us see how much it is going to cost, and let us decide whether $158 per family per year is too much, whether that much is necessary.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Has the Senator some other method than is provided in the legislation and in its administration for determining the amount of subsidy which ought to be paid in order to make a particular apartment available for the persons of the low-income group?

If I may add a word, we are getting down to families with incomes as low as three and four hundred dollars a year. When Congress passed the Housing Act, our idea was to get to the very lowest income group and try to help them first. In order to get the rent down to reach that low income group, we have to provide a fairly reasonable subsidy, and as the income increases, the subsidy payment will be less. But, so far as I am concerned, I want to get down to the very lowest income, and that will require a larger contribution.

Mr. TAFT. Suppose we said to any individual who wanted to build his home, "If you will borrow $3,000 we will give you a thousand dollars outright." Suppose we propose to subsidize the home owner instead of the renter. Expending a thousand dollars is going to be a great deal cheaper than paying $150 a year for 60 years to come. I am not advocating any particular method of subsidy; I say this is an extremely expensive method, and before we go ahead, before we plunge indefinitely into this field, which can lead nowhere except to something like an expenditure of $20,000,000,000, let us go a little slowly, and let us have a survey of the whole question.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, there is no proposal to spend $20,000,000,000. But while the Senator is talking about helping, by advancing a thousand dollars, the individual who has $3,000 with which to build a home, I am talking about families who for the whole year have an earning capacity of four to five hundred dollars, hardly enough to enable them to buy enough to enable the family to subsist. How can the Senator talk about bringing that class under such legislation as is proposed, a family which is prepared to make a $3,000 down payment? We are dealing with that class under F. H. A., but I am not concerned with those families at this time. A family which can put down a payment of $3,000 is fairly well off these days. I am talking about the slum dweller.

Mr. TAFT. If we finance a slum dweller or anyone else to the extent of a thousand dollars, he can borrow $3,000 and build himself a house. That is not the question. The trouble is, can he live in the house after he gets it? A thousand dollars today will finance any reasonable four- or five-room house. As a matter of fact, the number of people with incomes of three or four hundred dollars a year, taken care of by this department, is not great. The incomes run on the average between $800 and $1,000 a year.

The point I desire to make is that this is an extremely expensive method of handling the matter. There are plenty of other ways of doing it. We can subsidize home owning. Personally, I think it is necessary to have a certain number of low-rent housing projects, but I think that, just so far as we can help people to buy their own homes instead, we ought to do it. Someone should sit down and decide how many of these families may be able to have their own homes and how many families cannot, how many families, after we get through, are going to require a definite subsidy of as much as $150 or $200. Are we to give the same subsidy to a man who has $300 a year as to the man who receives a thousand dollars a year? We are, under this plan, apparently.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the income of the individual family that is to be housed by these projects is examined into. If a man earns above a certain sum, he is not eligible as an occupant at all, he has not a chance to get into one of the homes, because he is not a slum dweller.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator was talking about families with incomes of three or four hundred dollars a year. He is proposing to give them exactly the same subsidy, $200, that is given to a man with an income of a thousand dollars a year, because that is the highest limit that is proposed for admission to these housing authorities. In other words, if we are to subsidize housing, there is the question, must we subsidize it by Government housing, or should we not subsidize each family as we go along, and should we not revise the subsidy every year in accordance with their means? I do not say that is a good policy, I say that is a question which must be considered before we plunge into a policy which is going to cost us $20,000,000,000.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator will yield, that is the policy which has been adopted by the Housing Authority already. There is a provision in the contract for a reexamination of the rent charge, of the economic situation in the community, and as to whether a larger contribution can be made by the particular occupant or not. That is now provided by law.

Mr. TAFT. I do not wish to contradict the Senator, but my understanding is that the rate per room in every apartment in one of these projects is exactly the same. Whether a man gets $300 a year or a thousand dollars a year does not make any difference.

Mr. WAGNER. In any one project?

Mr. TAFT. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Of course; otherwise we will begin to include in all kinds of favoritism. But the lowest-income group in a particular community has first choice, and the slum dweller who lives in a slum and is to be rehoused in a new project has first choice, so long as his income is low enough.

Mr. TAFT. Of course, that is the policy proposed, but as a matter of fact not one single project of the United States Housing Authority has been opened, and in the only projects which have been opened, the P. W. A. in Cincinnati, for instance, a man must receive at least $1,000 a year before he can get into the project. That policy, I suppose is going, to be changed, but that is the policy up to date. In other words, the whole thing is experimental. No one knows what they are going to do when these things are finally worked out, and that is the reason why I urge that we be somewhat slow about throwing out another $800,000,000 the first of July.

Mr. WAGNER. Now we have reached a stage where, as a result of experience, we do know something. We do not have to experiment further except in the reduction of costs, and that is being taken care of every day. The Senator himself pointed out how in the city of New York the estimates of construction costs in the case of the Queensbridge project are 10 or 12 percent below the original estimates. So that we are getting our costs down. That is a matter of experience.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator is exceedingly optimistic if he can stand here and say that the housing policy of the United States is not still in an experimental stage. It is the most experimental activity, practically, in which we are engaged, and we are conducting more experiments than any nation has attempted in the history of the world.

Mr. WAGNER. I think we have learned a great deal in the last 5 or 6 years.

Mr. TAFT. Certainly we have learned a great deal in the last 5 or 6 years, but we have a good deal more to learn.

In addition to the amendment I am now discussing, I have proposed another amendment, to create a joint committee of the House and the Senate to consider the entire housing program, United States Housing Authority, Federal Housing Authority, and the Federal home-loan bank, and report next year.

My suggestion is that we give the Authority $400,000,000, enough to carry out the next year's program, and then next year have a report from the Authority which will say, "Here is in substance what we ought to do." Instead of spending $400,000,000, perhaps we ought to spend a billion dollars a year. I do not know. That is quite possible, because the Administrator testified that he would like to house 300,000 families a year, which would mean spending a billion three hundred and fifty million dollars a year instead of $800,000,000 as now suggested here.

I do not know what the result of a committee investigation might be. I should be very hopeful that such a report would show that this kind of housing is needed only in a limited quantity, and that we could get it done cheaper, and with a smaller subsidy, or financed through the U. S. H. A. or the Federal home-loan bank.

My amendment does not provide any check on the progress of the United States Housing Authority. Up to date they have allotted $650,000,000. They have not started much construction with that money, and they have finished nothing. If we adopt my amendment the Authority will have $150,000,000 left over, and will have $400,000,000 more. So that during the next year they will have $550,000,000 to allot to projects. In the period of a year and one-half, up to this date, they have allotted only $650,000,000. So they will be able to proceed on a larger scale than they have heretofore.

The testimony with respect to construction showed that under the present program we will not reach the peak of construction until January 1940. The peak of construction, during which about 175,000 men will be employed on the job, will last from about January 1940 until May 1940. If we provide another $550,000,000 now, it means that that rate of construction can continue until May or June 1941, and we will have plenty of time next year to provide the money which it might be decided at that time is necessary to continue the work beyond May 1941.

I think we want steady employment. We do not want to pour in $950,000,000, have it all allotted tomorrow, put a tremendous number of men to work, and then find that $950,000,000 a year is more than we want to spend. We do not want to build up a tremendous employment and then throw a lot of building mechanics out of work. That is the trouble about the whole plan. Today there is no planned program as to rate of construction. I asked the Administrator on that point, and after considerable difficulty received the answer which is printed in the Record.

To go ahead and every year build a definite number of homes would be the intelligent way to approach this problem. Incidentally, the longer we wait the cheaper it is going to be. The Administrator himself testified that every day they are finding new ways to cut down the cost of this particular housing. The longer we wait the less it is going to cost us to build the same number of family apartments. So I say, Very well; put in your $400,000,000. That continues the program for a period of 2 years. Think of it. Today not a single apartment house has been opened. We do not know what the policy is going to be. We do not know how the Authority is going to spend the money. We do not know how the people who are in the U.S. H. A. projects are going to live, or whether they are going to like them, or whether the rentals are going to be satisfactory. The thing is experimental.

I state to the Senate that the proper thing to do is to cut the amount in half, and then adopt the other amendment which provides that—

A joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives is hereby established to consist of five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate. It shall be the duty of such committee to make a comprehensive study of the activities of the Federal Government in the field of housing, particularly as administered by the United States Housing Authority, the Federal Housing Administration, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and other agencies of a temporary or emergency nature.

We have an experiment in Fort Wayne, Ind., and I understand we have a successful experiment in Uvalde, Tex. All those different plans could and should be considered by this committee.

Such committee shall particularly consider—

 The formation of a long-range plan for stimulating slum clearance and the construction of new housing for the lower and middle income groups with a minimum of outright Government subsidy;

(2) The coordination of all Government housing activity under one administrative head and the consolidation or elimination of agencies where such consolidations or elimination will promote greater economy and efficiency in administration; and greater economy and efficiency in administration; and

(3) The stimulation of private investment and private industry in the housing field.

As far as I can discover, and I went back through the books, each one of the three different policies of the Government has been adopted independently by a different committee after a separate investigation. Each one is the pet of a particular group of people which thinks it knows what ought to be done about housing. I propose here the establishment of a joint committee of the House and Senate rather than a departmental committee, because I think the committee will have to hold the scales of justice between these different departments, and listen to each of their complaints, and form a judgment which I hope ultimately will be the judgment of the Senate, as to how important each project may be, how much low-rent housing there should be, how much private industry should do, how much stimulation there would be through the insuring of loans.

I think that presents a constructive policy, and I hope very much that the Senate may see fit to adopt both amendments and put the United States in line for the adoption of a housing authority based on some intelligent consideration, on sound judgment, and on consideration for those low-income groups for whom the Senator from New York [Mr. Wagner] is so solicitous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft] on page 3, line 5, and page 3, line 13.

PURCHASE OF DUTCH POSSESSIONS IN THE WESTERN HEMISPHERE, DUTCH WEST INDIES ISLANDS AND DUTCH GUIANA

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, the United States is spending on its military budget, both Army and Navy, many hundreds of millions of dollars, a substantial part of which is for items which will be obsolete in the course of a few years. It is not a permanent investment on the books of the Government. Would it not be the part of wisdom to invest some of these millions in a permanent improvement of our national defense in a portion of our armor which is vulnerable? I speak of the Caribbean Sea, and more particularly in the crossroads of the Caribbean. I refer to that strategic island, Curação, which has the finest harbor in the Caribbean.

It is important today from the standpoint of sea and air power as it was in the days of wooden ships and iron men, when the Spaniards, the French, the English, the Dutch, and the Portuguese fought for its control as the point of vantage in the Caribbean. Ask our military tacticians about its importance. Ask our economic experts as to its position in the defense of our dwindling trade in South America. If we are honest in our search for a haven for refugees which we cannot absorb, let us examine those islands which for 300 years have been not only a haven but a heaven for the Jews of Portugal and Spain. In fact from these islands they have sent missionaries to the United States and have endowed synagogues in our cities. Let us look at the subject with frankness, and with a sense of realism:

Curação sits as a sentinel in the crossroads of the Caribbean, athwart the sea and air routes between South America and our eastern seaboard. It sits across the sea and air route between the Windward Islands and Panama. It is today an open approach to Central America. It could be an unlimited and endless fueling station for a hostile fleet.

We persuaded Denmark to sell us the Virgin Islands, not for their famous rum, but for their military value alone.

That was a wise military investment for the future. The purchase of Florida, the Louisiana Purchase, the purchase of Alaska, all were condemned by the unthinking at the moment.

The Dutch possessions in the Western Hemisphere consist of the group of Dutch West Indes Islands, the main one of which is Curaçao, and Dutch Guiana—Surinam—on the north coast of South America between French Guiana on the east and British Guiana on the west.

LOCATION

The islands consist of Curação, the largest and most important, and its dependencies, Aruba and Bonaire, about 50 miles off the coast of Venezuela; about 500 miles to the northeast is a less important group, namely, Saba, St. Eustatius, and part of St. Martin, all in the neighborhood of the Virgin Islands and about 100 miles to the eastward of the Virgin Islands. The two most important towns are Willemstad, the splendid port and capital of Curação, with 29,000 population, and Paramaribo, on the Surinam River in Guiana, 8 miles from the sea, with a population of 40,000.

AREA

The Dutch West Indies Islands have a total area of about 400 square miles. The main island of Curaçao is 40 miles long and contains 210 square miles. Aruba contains 49 square miles, Bonaire 95 square miles, St. Eustatius 9 square miles, Saba 5 square miles, and Dutch St. Martin 18 square miles. The area of Dutch Guiana is approximately 54,300 square miles, larger than that of the great State of Iowa, making the total area of the islands and Dutch Guiana almost 55,000 square miles. This area is equal to the size of the States of Pennsylvania and Vermont.

TOPOGRAPHY AND CLIMATE

Coral reefs surround Curação Island. The island is not mountainous but is rather flat, with some hills. The climate is warm, dry, and healthy. The average temperature from December to March is about 80°.

Dutch Guiana is divided into four regions: (1) The alluvial land along the coast about 3 miles inland; (2) the forest region, much of which is still unexplored, whose soil is rich and whose vegetation is dense; (3) the sandstone region, intersected by rivers and small forests; and (4) the savannahs, which consists of grassy regions and forest areas.

COMMERCE

The net tonnage entering the ports of the islands in 1935 was 19,070,226 tons, representing the tonnage of 11,382 vessels. The tonnage of the vessels entering Dutch Guiana in 1935 was 296,997 tons, representing 227 vessels. In 1936 the import and export trade of these islands with the United States was approximately balanced, the imports being in excess of $14,000,000, and the exports slightly below $15,000,000. In 1936 the total imports from all countries were valued at $116,109,000, and the total exports at $111,516,000. The export of mineral oils from Curação and Aruba in 1937 amounted to about 135,000,000 barrels, placing them among the world's greatest oil exporters.

However, the ratio of trade with the United States from Dutch Guiana is not balanced, inasmuch as the imports were of approximately $300,000 value, and the value of the exports was approximately $1,000,000. It is, therefore, apparent that while Dutch Guiana is a much larger territory and has greater natural resources yet undeveloped, its foreign trade is only a fraction of that of the Dutch West Indies Islands, principally Curação.

FINEST FUELING STATION IN CARIBBEAN

Curaçao is located strategically in the path of the Trinidad-Panama shipping and athwart the New York-Venezuela lines of communication. Willemstad in Curaçao has been described as the finest fueling station in the whole Caribbean. The harbor can accommodate the largest ocean steamers. It is one of the most thriving ports in the West Indies. A great number of vessels can dock simultaneously. The reason for the expansion of Willemstad as an outstanding Caribbean port is the oil wells of Venezuela.

ADJACENT TO RICHEST OIL LAND IN WORLD

Maracaibo, on the Maracaibo Gulf in the northwestern corner of Venezuela, is the center of the Venezuela petroleum industry. The Gulf of Maracaibo, however, is too shallow for ocean-going vessels, and consequently the petroleum is pumped through a pipe line to the Dutch island of Curaçao where it is refined and then exported through Curaçao's fine harbor.

Venezuela is one of the richest oil-producing countries in the world. Oil is found in an area of approximately 27,000 square miles, and of this area the Lake Maracaibo district is the richest. Due to the inability to transport this oil directly from the Maracaibo oil fields the Dutch island of Curaçao benefits from its capacity to refine and reexport this rich product. The British-Dutch Royal Shell group shares the field with the Standard Oil Co.

AMERICAN OIL AND ALUMINUM COMPANIES

The American Standard Oil Co. has established a very large oil refinery at St. Nicholas, on Aruba Island. American industry therefore has penetrated into two of the most lucrative industries in the Dutch West Indies, namely, the bauxite or aluminum industry in Dutch Guiana at Moéngo, which is controlled by the American Aluminum Trust, and the oil refining business in the islands of Curação and Aruba, where the Standard Oil Co. has great business interests.

ONE-FIFTH OF WORLD'S ALUMINUM

One-fifth of the world's aluminum is found in Dutch and British Guiana. The production in Dutch Guiana is about 400,000 tons per year, and in British Guiana about 300,000 tons per year. Oxide of aluminum or bauxite is the source of commercial aluminum metal, and it is found in a rather pure state, easily accessible for mining.

THE CROSSROADS OF THE CARIBBEAN-A POINT OF VANTAGE

Curação has been described as the crossroads of the Caribbean Sea. The Dutch originally captured Curação in order to secure a point of vantage in the Caribbean. The port of Willemstad on the island of Curação has the finest harbor in this region. The Dutch used it as a base from which to harass the Spanish shipping in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and its military value is increasing today. It must be acquired by the United States; and sooner or later it will be.

SOME COMPARISONS

The statistics relating to shipments from the United States to Alaska for the 12-month period for December 1938 show a total of $42,676,441, whereas the shipments to the United States from Alaska for the same period equal $56,044,728. These figures relative to commerce with Alaska are of great interest in comparison with the exports and reexports from the Dutch West Indies, which for the 12-month period ending December 1938 were $42,784,879 in exports from the United States of America. The imports to the United States of America for the same period were $20,578,511. The above figures relating to imports and exports are based upon the report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, United States Department of Commerce, compiled by the Division of Foreign Trade Statistics.

To repeat, the exports from the Dutch West Indies for the year 1938 were $42,000,000. In dollar value this is close to the total mineral production of the State of Colorado in 1935, which is reported by the United States Bureau of Mines to have been $44,413,000.

A MARKET FOR AMERICAN AGRICULTURE

The Dutch West Indies have been, and should continue to be, a good market for important American products—more particularly flour, corn meal, lard, meats, and canned goods. Part of this market was lost to South America during the World War, and part of the market went to France and Holland.

Butter and cheese imports from the United States are a substantial factor in food imports. Some of the markets lost during the World War have not yet been recovered.

Lumber, cement, and building materials are largely imported from the United States, although English and Swedish cement are strong competitors.

POPULATION AND RACES

A study of the population from a racial standpoint is most interesting. For example, Dutch Guiana has a total population of approximately 150,000, counting the so-called bush Negroes and the aboriginal Indians. The exact number of bush Negroes and aboriginal Indians is not definitely known. It is stated in authentic reports, however, that there are approximately 40,000 British Indians; 33,000 Japanese; 65,000 natives, including 17,000 bush Negroes and 2,500 aboriginal Indians; 2,000 Chinese; and only 1,900 white Europeans.

In addition to the so-called bush Negroes there is a very large number of plantation or town Negroes of various shades. It is easy to understand why there is not any real nationalistic feeling among the non-Dutch portion of the population or any attachment to the political institutions of the country.

COMMERCE CONTROLLED BY THE JEWS

In all of the Dutch West Indian Islands there are many descendants of Portuguese and Spanish merchants of the Jewish race, and this group has largely controlled the commerce of the islands, according to the Commercial and Industrial Handbook issued by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce (No. 212, 1922, p. 449). It is stated that they are closely connected by partnerships and form a compact commercial unit. They are sometimes referred to as the "uncrowned kings" of the Dutch West Indies. These shrewd merchants have contributed much to the prosperity of the islands. In fact, it is an interesting historical incident that this group extended its philanthropy to the United States by establishing four synagogues in the United States which were erected wholly by funds contributed by a few rich Jewish families of the island of Curação. These old patricians-Portuguese and Spanish Jewish families in the islands-have been the most influential groups from the time they settled there around 1635.

A HAVEN FOR THE JEWS

In this day when immigration to Palestine has been restricted by the British Government it would seem that the Dutch West Indies and Dutch Guiana might furnish a haven for the refugees of this race. This fact should assume a special importance, inasmuch as the existence of millions of unemployed in the United States precludes the change of immigration restrictions to refugees from any land. The fact that this race has thrived in the West Indies should be an inducement to other members of the same race to secure a haven in such favorable environment. The climate of Dutch Guiana and the islands is very favorable. It is generally warm, dry, and healthful. In fact the climatic conditions were a strong inducement to the original settlement of these islands by Europeans.

DUTCH GUIANA A VIRGIN TERRITORY

Dutch Guiana, with its more than 54,000 square miles of territory, having a population of not in excess of 150,000, almost one-third of which is in the capital of Paramaribo, is virgin territory for economic development. On a basis of a population of 150,000 and an area of more than 54,000 square miles, it will be noted that there are only three persons to the square mile of territory. From an agricultural standpoint it will be noted that the Dutch West Indies produce a variety of crops, such as cotton, sugar, rice, coffee, cacao, as well as other more profitable crops. Its mineral resources include salt, phosphate of lime, gold, and bauxite.

LANGUAGE

The language depends on the locality, but is largely English and Dutch, with a native language predominating among the native inhabitants. Spanish is the language of the educated classes.

A CHANGING SCENE

The changing of flags apparently has no great significance so far as the body of the population is concerned, and this is evidenced by the fact that these islands have been captured and recaptured, ceded and receded, traded and retraded, without inquiring of the desires of the native population, and apparently without any concern on their part. For instance, the Island of Curaçao, which is the largest of the West Indies, was settled by the Spanish in 1527; captured by the Dutch in 1634; captured by the English in 1800; shortly thereafter recaptured by the Dutch; recaptured by the English in 1807; and finally restored to the Dutch in 1816. Dutch Guiana was settled in 1630 by the English, and in 1644 was largely taken over by the Dutch, Portuguese, and Spanish Jews.

ENGLISH TRADED GUIANA FOR NEW YORK

The Dutch military occupied Guiana in 1666, and in 1667 the English gave up their claim to it in exchange for New Amsterdam, later New York. It was again taken over by the English in 1799, and was held by the English until 1816, when it was finally recovered by the Dutch.

NO STRONG NATIONALISM

In none of these transfers of territory was the native population consulted by the conquering nations, and it is likely that the transfer of sovereignty did not have any great effect on the sentiments of the body of people. It is equally obvious that in a territory with such differences of language and race and illiteracy there is an absence of any effective national spirit.

AIR BASES AND AIR LINES

In a time of rapid expansion of air power it is interesting to note that Dutch Guiana is on the main transport routes from Florida and South America via the West Indies. It is strategically situated on the Lesser Antilles and Central America and lies across the route from the Greater Antilles to South America.

PURCHASE OF GREENLAND

I have before me some maps which many Senators who are familiar with the Caribbean region have examined. The great Pan American Airways are covering this region now. These possessions—the Dutch, the British, the French, and the Danish—furnish excellent harbors and fine airports. I hope, at a later date, to have considered my resolution providing for the acquisition by purchase of Greenland—surveyed by our own great Lindbergh and found to be on the great northern circle route,

SOVIET FLYERS USE GREENLAND

Recently the Soviet flyers came across the tip of the Greenland Peninsula. I have made some research and investigation of its resources and harbor facilities and landing facilities. That land, too, must come under American dominion; it must be acquired by purchase from the Danes in the manner we acquired the Virgin Islands.

WILLEMSTAD THE BEST HARBOR IN THE GREAT CARIBBEAN SEA

It may be stated that the Dutch West Indies afford in Willemstad the best harbor in the Caribbean Sea. When one thinks of the great territory covered by the Caribbean it is saying a good deal to state that Willemstad is the finest harbor in that entire region. It is also one of the largest oil shipment centers in the world. Certainly it is as much a point of vantage today as it was in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries when the maritime nations of the world fought for its control. It lies across the air and sea lines between our eastern coast and South America, and also athwart the Windward Islands and the Panama Canal. Dutch Guiana is a vast virgin territory of immense resources. It is a vital necessity to America in her national-defense program. Its resources are tremendous and its territory as yet barely explored. It is American territory. It belongs to the Panama Canal defense zone. The day will come when the Stars and Stripes will float over its cities, fields, and forests forever.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I also wish to refer to the speech which I had the privilege to deliver before the Senate on the 19th of April 1939, concerning the war debts and the West Indies, in which I included the two resolutions with reference to Greenland and the Danish and Dutch possessions, resolutions which propose negotiation for purchase of all Danish and Dutch possessions in America. That speech is to be found in the Congressional Record of the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, page 4456.

I ask that Joint Resolution 120 be reincorporated at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 120) is as follows:

RESOLUTION FOR PURCHASE OF DUTCH POSSESSIONS

Whereas adequate provision for the protection of the Panama Canal is an indispensable feature of our national-defense policy;

Whereas possession of the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana by the United States would enable it to provide more adequately for such protection; and Whereas the colony of Curaçao and Netherlands Guiana export

Whereas the colony of Curação and Netherlands Guiana export products in which the United States is deficient and import products of which a surplus is produced in the United States: Therefore be it Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and requested to enter into negotiations, in such manner as he may deem appropriate, with the Government of Her Majesty the Queen of the or Curação and Netherlands Guiana. Such negotiations shall be conducted with a view to the making of a treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of the United States and the Government of the United States and the Government of the Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands providing for the purchase by the United States of the colony of Curação and Netherlands Guiana.

NEGOTIATION AND PURCHASE

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, in these days when we are expending huge amounts for the Army and the Navy and aircraft, I ask that the Senate do something constructive. An examination of the region between the tip of Florida and Trinidad, where one can stand on the hills and see the continent of South America, must convince the most skeptical that the great ships of the Navy of the United States cannot reach the Panama Canal without the permission of foreign powers. The string of islands, the long bow string, from South America to the tip of Florida bars the way. That string of islands, with a few submarines and a few mines, constitutes an impassable barrier. All this territory must be under the American flag. It can be acquired by negotiation and purchase.

ALASKA-THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE-ACQUIRED BY NEGOTIATION AND PURCHASE

I ask Senators, who are harassed by great domestic problems such as the housing bill, which the Senate has now under consideration, to remember that when our Government was considering the purchase of Florida, when it was considering the purchase of Louisiana in the days of Jefferson and Jackson and other great immortals of American history, when it was considering the purchase of the Oregon Territory, and the Gadsden purchase, men spoke lightly of those territories and possessions. I have had people say to me, "What do you want with those sand bars down there in the West Indies?" Men of intellect, men of intelligence, men of great education, they constitute some of our finest citizens, but I submit they are not informed about the resources of this region. They do not know that at the harbor of Willemstad, $125,000,000 of merchandise flow in and out each year; they do not realize that at Willemstad are some of the greatest oil refineries of the world. They, perhaps, have never examined into the fact that Willemstad is the finest harbor in the entire Caribbean region, and must become an American port.

While our State Department is so busily engaged in ventures to "save the world," in setting up the pins for whatever emergencies may be advancing in the future, perhaps we might save for America some of the neighboring territory lying just off our coast.

BERMUDA AND THE WEST INDIES

At some future day I desire to discuss the island of Bermuda, lying in a most strategic position, which should be acquired. I do not wish at this moment to discuss the manner and method of acquiring Bermuda nor any of the West Indies Islands, but at a later date I hope to do so at some length.

These islands are North American islands; they are off our own coast. We already have Puerto Rico. Recently, it will be remembered, we appropriated a large sum of money for air and other defenses in Puerto Rico. Who is there today who will deny that it was an excellent thing from a military and naval point of view that we took over the Virgin Islands? Away to the north is the remaining possession of the very fine Danish people, but it is American territory. Air lines cross Greenland. Lindbergh crossed its great plateau twice and made a very careful examination of all its harbors and possibilities, and the Soviet fliers the other day flew over the same region on their Moscow-New York flight. I asked them, through an interpreter, what the plan would have been if their ship had been compelled to come down in that region. The reply was that they could have landed about 40 miles north of Cape Farewell, on Greenland. Of course, planes that are amphibian, that can be used on land or sea, can use some of the harbors which are navigable the year around. Some of the valleys appear very green from the air. Perhaps that is why the country was named Greenland. The great ice cap does not cover all land and harbors, as many suppose.

FROM POLE TO PANAMA

All that is in the Far North. Coming down through Bermuda and through the Bahama Islands, and all the rest of the West Indies, we come to the coast of South America. Here we propose that negotiations be entered into with the Dutch Government, a great people with a great and rich history—a fine nation from which we can by negotiation purchase these great possessions. They are of a right American and must remain American. Our State Department can thus accomplish something a little more useful than the world-saving business in which we are always engaging. Let us save some of these outlying possessions for our country while there is yet time to do so.

MILITARY NECESSITY

We hear a great deal said on the floor of the Senate about the possibility that some foreign power may come and take possession of some of these islands. Very well; let us acquire them now by negotiation and purchase, and then they will be ours—these Dutch and the Danish possessions. Here our fleets can come to anchor; here our merchants can trade; and here great air armadas will drop down from the tropic skies; and I cannot often enough reiterate the great resources of these islands. I myself traveled in the independent countries of Haiti and the Dominican Republic, and in our cwn Puerto Rico; and I can testify, so far as I have investigated, to the great resources and the great possibilities of these regions.

WHERE THERE IS NO VISION THE PEOPLE PERISH

I hope that in the not distant future, through negotiations with our State Department and as a result of proper legislative action, we shall take over these islands, and that they may become a part of the great American Union, to the great advantage of the American people. I hear so much internationalism; it is so often said that we must do this and we must do that for others. I want to do something for America. for the American people, for the American Navy, and our fleets of the air, and its many ports in outlying possessions. I want to raise up ramparts on our own coasts, defenses unassailable, unconquerable so far as any foreign foe is concerned should they be so mad as to assail us here on our own ground, which I very much doubt; but, if such a thing should happen, we can rest our defenses and ramparts here in these possessions through negotiation and purchase, to the great advantage of our great American people.

I thank the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT OF 1937

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the object intended to be accomplished by this bill. I am going to vote for the bill. I believe great good may come from its passage. I have listened, however, to some criticisms which I thought were offered in the best of feeling, which were constructive in their nature, and I think were enlightening to the Senate and to the country.

As I said the other day, in the busy lives that Senators have to lead they cannot always give to a great deal of pending legislation the attention they would like to give. Our civilization has become so complex, our laws have become so intricate, our influence as a Nation has extended so widely, there are so many questions of a local domestic nature which call upon us for consideration, the awful depression which has encompassed the world has taken such heavy toll here as it has elsewhere, that often, no matter how much we may desire to give attention to the details of legislation, we cannot do so.

I have listened to much of the discussion on this bill, and I think it has been very enlightening. It has occurred to me, however, that I should like to make some suggestions regarding the measure. They come from one who does not claim to be an expert on the subject, one who believes it is necessary for him in the performance of his duty as best he can to listen to and follow the views of others who have made a greater study of this, as I consider it, difficult but interesting matter. It promises, I think, great results in the unemployment predicament in which we find ourselves. It will bring results, as I see it, to a class of persons in whom I feel particularly interested. Yet it seems to me, although it may be embarrassing to say so without knowing more than I do about the subject, that improvements along some lines might be made in the bill.

I desire to offer briefly some suggestions for the consideration of Senators and of those who will be required to carry out the provisions of any law we may enact on this subject. I do not know that they will be useful; I do not know that they will be followed; but at least it may be said in their favor that they will not cost anything.

It has always seemed to me that one of the difficulties which must be met in such a program as this bill attempts to carry out is that when we consider the vast number of persons we desire to benefit, and the requirements of modern life and modern homes, it is an impossibility to do as much as we should like to do in a way which will bring the most benefit to those who most need it.

All of us would like to see those who receive the lower wages for their labor live in their own homes. The ideal condition of the farmers and the industrial workers of the United States would be to have every farmer own the soil he tills, and to have every industrial worker own the home in which he lives. There is something about owning a home which cannot be explained, but which puts in the breast of every man and every woman who is trying to build up a home a pride, a satisfaction, a happiness in making the home more comfortable, more livable, and more enjoyable.

The trouble with the homes which have been built, or those which will be built under the present program, if I might call it such, is that they probably cost too much money. Yet I do not know how it is possible to build a completed modern home for less. The idea is to build a home for as little money as possible. It has struck me that if it is possible we ought to extend assistance to the laboring men and the poorer classes who do not now own homes but desire to own them.

I have before me an article on this subject which appeared in the Washington Post on May 12, written by Dorothy Thompson. She outlines in the article how an individual, moved by an idea to make money safely and modestly, has undertaken to build a number of homes for poorer people. It is a subject about which I have thought a great deal, and I was very much interested in this article. The theory is that, instead of erecting complete homes, we could, if we were careful as to the kind of people to whom we sold them, build more houses for less money and spread the good of public funds in building homes over a greater territory, and satisfy a much larger number of people. The theory is not to complete a house, but to build a home with ground enough adjacent to it to make possible the cultivation of a garden, the planting of trees, the raising of a few vegetables, and the planting of flowers, so as to bring comfort and beauty to the home. The idea is to erect an unfinished home, with the foundation parts of it so established and so built that the owners can continue to improve the property and eventually get a complete, modern home. The proper procedure would be to build a home completely modern in every respect; but if we did that, the cost would be prohibitive for workingmen. Miss Thompson describes in this article the building of such homes, which, of course, would not all be the same. I am merely offering these suggestions for those who have to administer the housing law. In some places the kind of home suggested would be unsuitable perhaps. The idea would be to build a home with a furnace in it, the home to be unpainted, and not decorated inside. It would be wired for electricity all through but with no electric fixtures installed. Sometimes perhaps the bathroom would be left out but there would be a place for it. Inside toilet would be omitted but a place would be provided for its installation. The various steps of modernization-electrification, for instance—could be taken from time to time by the man who bought the home, and by the wife by his side, they working together, building up what would eventually be a modern, complete home.

Such men and women get happiness out of their work when they are building a home. The workman labors 8 hours a day, we will say, and has much leisure time, and, with the assistance of his wife, and perhaps of his children, if he has any, he does a vast number of things which are necessary to make a home complete. But they probably have not the financial ability to pay for everything at the time the house is built. They may build a sidewalk; they may paint the house; they may do a thousand and one things which will beautify and make the home more comfortable. They plant flowers; they plant trees; they plant shrubbery. If possible, there is a small garden. Eventually they get a home. They would be frightened if they knew at the start what the undertaking would cost. In many cases the cost would be prohibitive.

Mr. President, I admit that at the outset care must be taken as to the man who buys the home, and who must go in debt for nearly the whole cost. It seems to me the Government could finance such undertakings better than any individual could. A private individual ordinarily charges 6percent interest, a burden that is entirely unnecessary to be imposed if the home is to be built by the Government with no idea of making a profit.

It would have to be remembered that when the home was sold it would be sold to a man who wanted a home, who was unable to pay for it in cash, who was unable to pay $6,000, we will say, for a home. Probably sixteen hundred would be all he could pay.

Such a purchaser should have a long time within which to pay for the home, and he should have a low rate of interest to pay. Then, too, if he lost his job, the interest ought to stop. If he should lose his job through no fault of his own, and could not get another, the holder of the mortgage ought to be lenient, should not exact interest or rent if the man had no income, and it was impossible for him to pay anything unless by the labor of his hands he earned some kind of an income. There would be some risk to take, but could not a great Government afford to take it better than a private individual, for whom the private motive enters into the consideration?

Sometimes the scheme would fail, but in the vast number of cases I think it would be a success. The laboring men of the United States want homes; they want places they can call their own; they want to help make those homes; they want to build them up. The wives want to plant flowers and to make the homes beautiful and comfortable. When the children come, the parents want a proper place in which to nurse them and care for them, and eventually they get a completed home.

Mr. President, I ask that the article by Dorothy Thompson to which I have referred be printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON THE RECORD (By Dorothy Thompson) A SOCIAL INVENTOR

Sometime ago Mr. Frank Hoess, who, together with three brothers, runs a machine-tool industry in Hammond, Ind., became interested in housing. Having a little money of his own, he proceeded ested in housing. Having a little money of his own, he proceeded to do something about it.

What Mr. Hoess has done is interesting, but the process of his thought, which led him to do just what he has done, is even more interesting. For Mr. Hoess began by considering a specific problem and he started his thinking process by contemplating not the ideal house but the actual client for whom the house was to be built.

Mr. Hoese wanted to haild house for workingmen. So he first of house but the actual client for whom the house was to be built.

Mr. Hoess wanted to build houses for workingmen. So he first of all took into account the economic, social, and psychological facts concerning workingmen. He totaled up on the ledger of his mind the assets and liabilities of workingmen as buyers of houses.

First of all, he argued, a workingman is a man with no savings and no assured income whatsoever. If he has savings, he is an exception. Workingmen do not save except to pay for something specific. The workingman is employed by the hour or the day or the week. He has no annual income. If he is employed full time—Mr. Hoess was considering workers in Gary and Hammond, Ind.—he earns from $25 to $30 a week, on an average, but he may be at any moment employed on half time, or part time, or not at all.

Therefore, argued Mr. Hoess, no worker under present condi-tions—and Mr. Hoess was not arguing about the conditions, he was just thinking about housing to meet the conditions—there-fore, no worker can justly be held to any rigidly fixed charges whatsoever, since he has no guaranteed income for even a year

What assets has the worker got? Mr. Hoess argued in his mind. Let's not worry whether they are the kind of assets usually entered on ledgers:

Well, he has time. He has more time than any worker has ever had in history. If he is fully employed he works—in that region—a 40-hour week. That means that he has leisure. Leisure-time activity, he ruminated, consists in doing something you want to do which you aren't compelled to do.

What else has the worker got? Usually, skillful hands. He is a man accustomed to using his hands, and is clever with them. What else has he? Transportation. Either he has some kind of a car, or his neighbors and friends have, or there is a bus line nearby, or other means of collective transportation. He doesn't need to live shoved up against the factory.

What does he want? Hoess asked himself.

He does not want to be in debt, burdened with a greater debt

What does he want? Hoess asked himself.

He does not want to be in debt, burdened with a greater debt than he can see the end of. He doesn't want to mortgage his life for 30 or 40 years. He does want a decent home for his children in a decent community. He wants to own property. (Mr. Hoess is convinced that the passion to own property is a basic human passion.) He wants that property to bring him in something as well as cost him something. He doesn't want to get something for nothing, and he has no respect for or trust in anybody who offers him something for nothing. He wants security.

Mr. Hoess now proceeded to meet the demands of a market of workmen inside the actual conditions of their lives. Halfway between Gary and Hammond he began putting up houses on farm land which was along a main highroad with a bus line. The property is 15 miles from either industrial center, so he didn't have to pay for existing social increment. He laid out the land in plots—and each plot is 1 acre large.

Mr. Hoess argues that if a man has an acre of land he can get

Mr. Hoess argues that if a man has an acre of land he can get something from it. He can grow vegetables, small fruits, chickens or rabbits, Mr. Hoess is of German origin, and he shares the German passion for land; he thinks that every normal human being wants to have a piece of land to call his own, and that its mere possession gives him a psychological feeling of security. Mr. Hoess did not landscape the acres. He planted one fruit tree on every one-just to grow on.

If a man is earning, in good times, $25 to $30 a week, all he can afford to pay for a house is from $1,000 to $2,500, Mr. Hoess decided. Anybody who sells him a house costing more is selling him a gold brick. Sconer or later he is going to default and lose him a gold brick. Sconer or later he is going to default and lose his equity.

At this price you cannot afford to offer a very luxurious dwelling, but you can offer something better than the worker has ever had—and Mr. Hoess is a realist. So he built "basic houses." The $1,600 house is firmly built of steel siding and roofing of wood—he is still experimenting to see which is better—it contains a kitchen, a living room, two bedrooms, a small room for a bath, but without the fixtures; a chemical toilet and an unfinished attic in which other rooms can be built other rooms can be built.

It is not painted nor is the interior decorated

It has a small furnace and is wired for electricity, but has no fixtures.

Mr. Hoess reckons that the owner of the house can do these Mr. Hoese fections that the owner of the house can not hiese things himself—the painting, the installation of fixtures, and that, given the place to put it and water in the house, he will even, when he wants it enough, get himself a bathroom.

And it turns out that he is right. The houses are all painted, and painted with exceptional attractiveness, each man to his taste, with some regard for the whole effect.

Papa buys some electric fixtures somewhere-maybe out of an old house or maybe from a mail-order house, and likes them that much better. He finishes up the rooms in his spare time, with the aid of his wife. Most of the houses have window boxes. He actually likes his house better because it represents some of his

When it comes to paying for the house, Mr. Hoess is highly unorthodox. He charges 6 percent interest on the investment, but a real 6 percent, not a gyp 6 percent.

It is adjusted month by month, with every payment on amortiza-

Mr. Hoess would like his customers to be able to put down a couple of hundred dollars as a first payment, but he has sold plenty of houses to men who didn't have a cent for a first payment.

He reckons that the buyer would normally spend about a quarter of his income for rent, so he figures interest, taxes, and amortiza-tion on this basis.

But Mr. Hoess doesn't believe that a man can be paying for a house if he hasn't any income or that he can pay as much if he is working half time as if he is working full.

So if the buyer's wages are reduced, Mr. Hoess automatically reduces the charges on the house in exact proportion. And if he has no income at all, Mr. Hoess suspends all payments on the Crazy? Not at all, argues Mr. Hoess. Good business. Turnover is death in the real-estate business. People who know the house belongs to them no matter what happens take excellent care of it. "My money might as well be sitting in those houses as in a bank," says this queer capitalist. (I have known him even to suspend all payments until a man paid for his wife's confinement. "A worker capit have for a help and pay for his house at ment. "A worker can't pay for a baby and pay for his house at the same time. If he has a baby, he'll care more about the

If you want to make Mr. Hoess mad, call him a philanthropist. He insists that he built these houses to make money, that he is making a good 6 percent on his investment, and that that is his sole interest in the whole venture.

He says he wants to keep his customers; that if men know they have a home in which is invested not only part of their income, but part of their labor, if they have gardens from which they can get part of their food, they will hold on, not become discouraged at the first lay-off, and the houses will get paid for in the end.

When the houses are paid for or the debt reduced to with the house are paid to of the debt feduced to a certain point, Mr. Hoess will enlarge and improve the house if the owner wants it. He will build him a garage, if the owner hasn't already built it himself, or add a wing, or put in a bathroom. But at no time must the debt be above the original limit.

One owner's wife had a pantry full of canned corn, string beans, and peas. She said she'd figured that they'd never paid anything of are of the house at all, because whether they'd never head how here so far on the house at all, because whatever they'd paid had been compensated by what they'd grown.

This eccentric real-estate man says that the difficulty with a scheme like this is not with organized labor. It's with the real-estate interests. Most real-estate men, he says, don't care a hoot whether the customer can ever pay for the house he buys or not. The seller is interested only in his commission. The builder has never designed for a specific market governed by specific conditions conditions.

Most Government-built houses, he says, can never be paid for by people in the low-income brackets. Either the Government is presenting them with a gift or the Government is going to have to evict them one of these days.

Mr. Hoess is a social inventor. This country is full of ingenious people of this type. Only it is rarely that one stumbles across them. There is nothing grandiose about this project. Mr. Hoess has only built thirty-odd houses to date. But unless there is a trick in it somewhere, he has done some very interesting, realistic and humane thinking.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to quote briefly from the article. Miss Thompson, speaking of the cost, says:

At this price you cannot afford to offer a very luxurious dwelling, but you can offer something better than the worker has ever had—and Mr. Hoess—

Who is the man who is trying the experiment, if it be an experiment-is a realist. So he built "basic houses." The $1,600 house is firmly built. * * * It contains a kitchen a living room firmly built. * * * It contains a kitchen, a living room, a small room for a bath, but without the fixtures; a chemical toilet, and an unfinished attic in which other rooms can be built.

It is not painted, nor is the interior decorated.

She says in another place, "Is this man crazy?" He is proceeding on the theory that if the home buyers lose their jobs the interest ceases. He is going to let them stay in the houses. The Government could better afford to do that than could a private individual, who might be pushed by financial interests to crowd the buyers, or to foreclose on them. But if the purchaser was doing right, if the only difficulty was that he had temporarily lost his job, or if sickness had made it compulsory that he use all his money to take care of his wife, or his children, or himself, the Government would waive payments as his ability to pay ceased.

What kind of man would the Government get in that kind of homes? What kind of women and children would go into them? They would be men and women who wanted to own a roof over their heads, who would want to have a place which they could call their own.

Would we be afraid of that kind of a risk? Every time they painted the house, and decorated it inside, and put in an electric light fixture, and added something in the way of a bathroom, the security would be better than it previously was.

Mr. President, I think it would be a good investment if we figured it all through to the end before we started, and decided that if anything unfortunate happened to one of these buyers or his wife or children who were trying to build a home, the charges and the interest should cease. They would have a long time in which to pay for the home, with the privilege of paying off sooner, if possible. The men and women who wanted homes would try to pay their debts just as soon as they could.

Crazy? Not at all, argues Mr. Hoess. Good business. Turn-over is death in the real-estate business. People who know the house belongs to them no matter what happens take excellent care of it. "My money might as well be sitting in those houses as in a bank," says this queer capitalist. (I have known him even to suspend all payments until a man paid for his wife's confinement. "A worker can't pay for a baby and pay for his house at the same time. If he has a baby, he'll care more about the house.")

How true, Mr. President! As that man's family ties increase, as children come to bless his very humble home, he will love his home better than he ever did before. I think with the man mentioned in the article that it is good business to save our people, make respectable citizens of them, and let them grow up with the knowledge that they own their own homes.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a minor amendment to the bill. If the language of the bill remains as it is written, there would be two sections 10. Therefore I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 23, it is proposed to strike out "Sec. 10" and to insert in lieu thereof "(10)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment? The Chair hears none.

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The question now recurs on the amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 1 O'CLOCK P. M. TOMORROW

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in recess until 1 o'clock p. m. tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT OF 1937

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other

Mr. BARKLEY. I now ask unanimous consent that not later than 3 o'clock p. m. tomorrow the Senate shall proceed to vote on the pending bill and all amendments thereto, and I ask unanimous consent to waive the requirement of the rule for a roll call at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to waiving the requirement of the rule providing for a roll call prior to entering into a unanimous-consent agreement? Chair hears none. Is there objection to the unanimousconsent agreement proposed by the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have listened with unusual interest to every word about domestic matters that has just been spoken by our distinguished colleague from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], the Senate's most useful Member. As the result of having read an article from the pen of Miss Dorothy Thompson, he has indeed approached a serious problem with which we in America are confronted, a problem which is unusually interesting from many standpoints. He has approached a problem which interests itself fundamentally with Americanism, about which we hear so little during these trying times.

Mr. President, I wish to say that the senior Senator from Nebraska hit the nail squarely on the head when during the course of his argument he made mention of the fact that we should take such action and enact such laws as will cause the American public to be contented. One thing which has really made America the greatest nation upon the face of the earth is its love for security in the form of home ownership. Home ownership was the initial desire of those who first set foot upon the fertile soil of America. Our forefathers came here seeking not only freedom of thought and freedom of action, but having in mind home ownership, the development of a place which they might properly and legally declare to be their own.

I recall having read some years ago an address made by North Carolina's greatest man, the Honorable Zebulon B. Vance, who was our war governor, and who later served in this body, in which he stated that no man would shoulder a gun for the purpose of defending a boarding house. By that he meant exactly what the Senator from Nebraska stated today, when he encouraged home ownership within the confines of the United States of America. I may add that the finest security upon the face of the earth is home ownership. I believe with the Senator from Nebraska that nothing can provide more interest or more contentment or more security than ownership of a home.

Unfortunately, in a sense, a number of years ago, millions of our people who had resided in the countryside left their old homes and went to the cities, where great industrial activities were taking place. Particularly in my section of the country, the South. They left their country homes and went to the cities because there they could find opportunity for work for their children in such places as the textile plants. As a result of this great industrial development in America, as we have found in other sections of the world, the people have left contentment, and the farm, and the great open spaces to concentrate themselves in the metropolitan centers.

I infer from what the Senator from Nebraska has said that he is encouraging a back-to-the-land and a back-tothe-home movement, a movement away from what has been going on for a number of years past. I was delighted when I learned the contents of the article from the pen of Miss Dorothy Thompson, which he read in part to the Members of this body. I think it a wonderful idea to encourage particularly the young to seek homes for themselves, because after all there is nothing which provides such comfort and security as does the ownership of a home.

As was stated a moment ago, if one wishes to provide himself with comforts, with happiness, and with security, it is not at all necessary that he provide himself with a mansion or a palatial dwelling or a house of any considerable proportions. One does not have to have a mansion, one does not have to be possessed of a palace, one does not have to be possessed of a palatial residence to find happiness and contentment. One can find that, Mr. President, only in one's self

The trouble about the people of this country is that everyone is trying to outdo everyone else. The happiness the American people are seeking is a false, a varnished, an artificial happiness. John Jones is trying to outdo his neighbor Bill Brown, who lives across the street. In other words, we are hypocritical; we are pretentious; and we are all for show. Instead of trying to outshine our neighbors we should be concentrating ourselves upon seeking happiness and contentment within the home and not without the home.

According to the American idea of outdoing the neighbors, if John Jones has a baby grand piano, he will put his piano out in the front yard so that he can show his neighbor that he has more than his neighbor has. If John Jones has a good garage, but purchases a Cadillac, a Rolls Royce, or a master Buick when he has been accustomed to a Ford, John will leave his master Buick, his Cadillac, or his Rolls Royce standing in the street in front of the house instead of putting it in the garage, so that he can show his neighbor Bill Brown across the street that he has a better car than Bill Brown has.

Mr. President, the trouble with the people of America today-and it applies more to America than to any other country in the world-is that we are trying to show off. We want to outshine our neighbors. What we should be doing is seeking contentment, security, and happines in the proper

It does not cost much to own a house. That statement applies not only in North Carolina but in every State of the Union. It applies to the vast territory within a radius of 50 miles of the Capital of our country. One can go into the State of Maryland and purchase fairly good land for $15 an acre. One can leave the Senate Office Building and within 30 minutes find himself at a lovely spot on land which can be bought for $15 an acre.

Let us see how cheap and how easy it would be for some of our young married Government clerks to acquire a home if they really wanted a home with flowers, babbling brooks, musical streams, the chirping of birds, a profusion of vegetation, and the blueness of the sky. Those are the things that bring happiness. They are the things that count. Happiness is not expensive. Happiness is the cheapest thing on the face of the earth for the person who is actually seeking happiness, and who is honest with himself.

Let us see. There are thousands upon thousands of young married couples in the Government service. They are paying anywhere from $45 to $125 a month for a little compact apartment. It is true they are right in Washington where everything is going on. It is true that they have electric lights. They have fine thoroughfares, motion pictures, theaters, and cocktail lounges, and they can go to dances every night. They think they are having a wonderful time. However, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, they would be much happier if they were possessed of something real.

A home is the greatest thing upon the face of the earth. Does it cost much? Not at all. Let us see. One can go into Maryland or over yonder in Virginia, not more than 20 miles from Washington, or certainly not more than 40 miles from here, and buy all the land he wishes at anywhere from $9 to $20 an acre. Many portions of that land have lovely little streams and brooks flowing through them. One can go out there and commune with nature.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am very appreciative of the lecture the Senator is giving-

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is not a lecture at all, if I may interrupt the Senator from Washington. I have listened to a very inspirational address by our distinguished colleague the senior Senator from Nebraska, and I was merely enlarging upon what he had to say in reference to encouraging the American people to become home owners.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I was about to suggest to the Senator that if he is really anxious to provide a way to bring happiness to the people in Washington who, because of the fact that they are in this crowded city, may not have the happiness to which they think they are entitled, he should suggest that they move to the Little Gem City of the Mountains in North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I appreciate that remark immensely, Mr. President.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That would be the acme of hap-

Mr. REYNOLDS. I appreciate the suggestion of my good friend. He comes from the gateway to the Northwest and to the great Alaskan Territory. He very ably represents the city of Seattle, which unquestionably is a city of beauty and a city of flowers. I know that statement to be true, because I have visited that city a number of times. Every time I visit the city of Seattle I like it better. I have noted the improvement that my good friend has brought to his city, and I shall return again in the fall. For my friend and colleague in the Senate to recommend to all who live in Washington that they visit Asheville, N. C., the Little Gem City of the mountains. which daily kisses the blue heavens, is a compliment to North Carolina, the greatest State in the Union. I thank my friend.

Mr. President, 30 minutes' travel will carry one to Virginia or Maryland, where he can purchase 10 acres of land for $150. He can buy a piece of ground which has a little brook flowing through it, and which is profuse with vegetation. He does not have to have half a dozen rooms to begin with. Millions of persons in this country are occupying two-room apartments. Two rooms in the country can be just as large as two rooms in the city. I might add that some of the most attractive places I have ever seen in my life are small places all on one floor.

I see my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] in the Chamber. The eastern section of his State, which is a beautiful section, at one time was a part of North Carolina.

In that section of the country one can find some of the most attractive little places he could ever wish to feast his eyes upon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me say that that section of the State of Tennessee is even an improvement upon North Carolina

Mr. REYNOLDS. I cannot say that it is an improvement upon North Carolina; but I will say that the people of that section have made great progress, because they have had the inspiration of North Carolina as an example for their direction and progress.

Mr. President, 10 acres of land at $15 an acre would cost $150. One can buy from some of the companies in the Northwest houses in the form of bungalows which are already patterned, the timbers of which are already cut, for about $450, which includes the price of erection by carpenters at their daily wage in the respective sections of the country. Four hundred and fifty dollars added to $150 makes $600; and we will add $400 for fencing, furnishings, such painting as may be desired, the purchase of a couple of little pigs-cute little things [laughter]-and the purchase of a good milk cow which will give milk and cream from which butter and buttermilk can be made. The intensive cultivation of 1 acre of land would produce enough during the spring and summer to provide the family with fresh and wholesome vegetables. If the housewife is sufficiently industrious she can can sufficient food, as Senators who have lived on farms know, to feed a family of five during the greater portion of the winter.

So I say, Mr. President, that what we need in this country is decentralization. Years ago we interested ourselves in flocking to the cities to find employment with the great industrial enterprises, as we did in North Carolina when the textile industry moved from Massachusetts to North Carolina. We can decentralize the cities, where there are millions upon millions of unfortunate people for whom we endeavor to supply comforts today by our housing program.

Mr. President, I again thank my good friend from Washington [Mr. Schwellenbach] for his contribution to my remarks. I assure him that our Department of Development and Conservation in North Carolina will be indebted to him for providing me the opportunity once again to advertise to the world that North Carolina is the greatest, most historic, and most progressive State in the Union, and that western North Carolina, where I live, is the most beautiful spot that has ever been kissed by God's warm, mellow, golden sunshine.

MARKING OF PACKAGES CONTAINING WILD ANIMALS AND BIRDS AND PARTS THEREOF

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last during my absence the House considered and passed the bill (H. R. 4637) to amend section 243 of the Penal Code of the United States, as amended by the act of June 15, 1935 (49 Stat. 378), relating to the marking of packages containing wild animals and birds and parts thereof. An identical bill (S. 1031) passed the Senate on May 29. I asked for the immediate consideration of the Senate bill by the House Committee on Agriculture, my request was granted, and the committee reported the bill favorably. I now ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1031 for immediate consideration and passage, inasmuch as the House discussed and passed an identical bill on Monday last. I take this time merely to explain the situation and expedite the procedure.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 243 of the act of March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," as amended by section 201 of the act of June

"All packages or containers in which the furs, hides, or skins of wild animals are shipped, transported, carried, brought, or conveyed, by any means whatever, from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to, into, or through another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country shall be plainly and clearly marked, labeled, or tagged on the outside thereof with the names and addresses of the shipper and consignee."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

R. 3945) to authorize the use of War Department equipment for the Confederate Veterans' 1939 Reunion at Trinidad, Colo., August 22, 23, 24, and 25, 1939, which was on the Consent Calendar. I learned only this morning that the Senate, on April 20, passed an identical bill, S. 1243. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1243 for immediate consideration and passage.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to lend, at his discretion, to the reunion committee of the United Confederate Veterans, for use at the National Confederate Veterans' reunion, to be held at Trinidad, Colo., August 22, 23, 24, and 25, 1939, 2 hospital ward tents, with all pegs, poles, and equipment necessary for their erection; 1 storage tent complete with all equipment; 1 large wall tent complete with all equipment; 6 small wall tents complete with all equipment; 10 pyramidal tents complete with all equipment; 10 pyramidal tents complete with all equipment; 10.00 cots, iron; 1,000 comforters; 1,000 cotton-felted pillows complete with cotton pillowcases; 2,000 cotton bedsheets; Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property; the same to be delivered from the nearest quartermaster depot at such time prior to the holding of said reunion as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the Confederate Reunion Committee: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivery of such property, shall That the Secretary of War, before delivery of such property, shall take from said reunion committee of the United Confederate Veterans a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLASSIFIED EXECUTIVE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado, from the Committee on Rules. submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 217

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 960, a bill extending the classified executive civil service of the United States. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Civil Service, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. Sweeney asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD during the debate in Committee of the Whole on the Social Security Act certain material, including the summation of findings by the Interorganization Council of Indiana, a very brief excerpt, and a letter from William H. Book, the vice chairman of the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Indianapolis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Luplow]?

There was no objection.

PRESENTATION OF MONUMENT TO THE PEOPLE OF GREECE

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 294) providing for the presentation by the President of the United States of a certain monument to the people of Greece.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. O'NEAL]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, this is a gift of Americans of Greek descent to the people of their native country?

Mr. O'NEAL. The Order of Sons of Pericles, which is the Junior Order of Ahepa, a very patriotic Greek society, has raised money for a memorial to be placed in Missolonghi, Greece, commemorating the participation of Americans in the war for freedom of Greece in 1821. No money is involved in this resolution whatever. I believe the State Department is very agreeable to the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is it not a fact that there has been a very close relationship between the American people and the Greek people, and that this is simply an effort to cement that friendship of long standing between two free people?

Mr. O'NEAL. That is true. Even the President of the United States went so far in 1821 as to express the great friendship and regard America had for Greece.

Mr. FISH. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the House of Representatives did a very unusual thing a few years ago in passing a simple resolution congratulating the Greek people on the one hundredth anniversary of their independence.

Mr. O'NEAL. This feeling has always existed.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to make a further explanation of this resolution if anyone so desires.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President is authorized and directed on behalf of the Order of the Sons of Pericles (the Junior Order of Ahepa), a national fraternity of youthful American citizens of Helenic descent, and on behalf of the people of the United States, to present to the people of Greece, or provide through the American Minister to Greece for the presentation to the people of Greece of, the monument recently erected by the said Order of the Sons of Pericles in the Garden of Heroes at Missolonghi, Greece, the shrine of Greek independence, as a tribute to and in commemoration of those patriotic Americans who, aided by the moral and material support and assistance of the entire American people, gave their services, their fortunes, and their lives to the cause of Greek independence in the Greek Revolutionary War of 1821.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the President is authorized and requested on behalf of the Order of the Sons of Pericles (the Junior Order of Ahepa), a national fraternity of youthful American citizens of Hellenic descent, to provide through the American Minister to Greece for the presentation to the people of Greece of the monument recently erected in the Garden of Heroes at Missolonghi, Greece, the shring of Greek independence, as a tribute to and in commemoration of those patriotic Americans who, aided by the moral and material support and assistance of the entire American people, gave their services, their fortunes, and their lives to the cause of Greek independence in the Greek Revolutionary War of 1821."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for the presentation through the American Minister to Greece of a certain monument to the people of Greece."

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and include therein a part of the report on House Joint Resolution 294, which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. O'NEAL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Speaker, the Order of Sons of Pericles, the Junior Order of Ahepa, is a fine patriotic society, like its senior, the Ahepa. They have done a magnificent thing in providing for this memorial, and I take pleasure in including as a permanent record a part of the committee report upon this bill. I also wish to express my appreciation to Mr. ROBERT ALLEN, Congressman from Pennsylvania, for the great interest he exhibited in this bill.

The Order of Sons of Pericles, the Junior Order of Ahepa, was instituted as a fraternal organization on January 30, 1926, in Manchester, N. H. Today the fraternity has initiated into its ranks over 8,000 members and has a total of 202 chapters, 196 in the United States and 6 in the Dominion of Canada, during the short 13 years of its existence.

The membership of the Order of Sons of Pericles is composed of youths of Hellenic descent, between the ages of 14 and 23, who are today organized in an organization, Nation-wide in scope and activity, with a full program of education, sports, mutual aid and benefit, and the establishment of fraternal bonds of mutual good will and cooperation.

Like its senior order, the Order of Ahepa, a national order of American-Hellenic citizens of the United States, the Order of Sons of Pericles yearly gives scholarship aid to its members. However, not only does the order give scholarship aid to its members but it also offers them summer camps, district and sectional meetings and conclaves; intersectional and interdistrict competitions in all sports; an annual excursion to Greece, which is offered to bring to our members a glance into the lives of the youth of other lands; an members a giance into the lives of the youth of other lands; an outlined educational program in the very chapter rooms and a healthful and broadening experience in social contacts; and the problems of cooperation and unity between and among individuals and groups, as well as aid in securing employment and a chance in their respective vocations in life.

As a part of its program of further cementing and binding the good will that exists between the two countries of America and Greece, the Order of Sons of Pericles, under the direction of Mr. John F. Davis, of Scranton, Pa., chairman of the supreme advisory board

F. Davis, of Scranton, Pa., chairman of the supreme advisory board of the Sons of Pericles, has erected a monument in the city of Missolonghi to the memory of those noble and valiant philhellenes of America who in the years of 1821–30 aided the struggling patriots in securing their independence from Turkey, after 400 years of

in securing their independence from Turkey, after 400 years of slavery and oppression.

Almost every important nation, with the exception of America, today has erected monuments at the city of Missolonghi in memory of their nationals who fought for and aided Greece in her revolution of 1821. Knowing this fact and feeling the great need of a monument of recognition to those great Americans, the Order of Sons of Pericles has completed its memorial to the philhellenes of America of 1821, and will hold the unveiling on July 4, 1939, during the annual Sons of Pericles excursion to Greece.

Greece, the light of the world for over 2,000 years, fell beneath the armies of the Mohammedan Turks in 1456 with the fall of Constantinople. Shortly thereafter all of Greece became a subject of the Turkish pashas, and for 400 years, until her successful struggle for freedom that opened on March 25, 1821, that resulted in her final freedom as a free nation and people, Greece was but a province of Turkey, and under Mohammedan rule. Greece, the center and the first believer in and adopter of Christianity, saw her great churches turned into Mohammedan mosques, and in Greece Christianity slept quietly but with open eyes and ready mind until her day should come once again.

day should come once again.

The fight for independence was centered in the city of Missolonghi, Greece, today named the Holy City because of the great siege staged there and the many sacrifices given by the Greek patriots in defending the city. The siege lasted through 4 weary years. In the city only 410 fighting men at one time defended the thousands of old men, women, and children gathered there, while 30,000 Turkish soldiers constantly hammered at the walls. They were 4 years of starvation, misery, and disease for the defenders. Time and again they were saved from complete annihilation by courageous and foolhardy attacks on the Turkish Armies by Greek patriots who came down from the mountains to worry the siegers in attempts to drive them away from the city. Defeat for those in the city meant death under the sword.

The Turkish pashas were determined that their revolting subjects should pay with their lives for their uprising. The popula-

The Turkish pashas were determined that their revolting subjects should pay with their lives for their uprising. The populations of many cities were wiped out, and the struggle could but either end in victory for the Greek patriots or in their complete massacre under the Turkish swords. Christianity was waging its bitterest struggle, determined to push the Mohammedan out of Europe or resign itself to death.

On April 10, 1826, Missolonghi fell, and the city with its inhabitants was destroyed and left a burning pyre. Only 2,000 citizens, with superhuman efforts, broke through the lines and escaped into the nearby hills.

Slowly the world had learned of the struggle in Greece, and the response of the American people was instantaneous and complete.

On December 4, 1822. President James Monroe expressed the hope and the earnest belief that Hellas would become a free nation and that she would attain her rightful place among the nations of the world as her due. Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, and other great legislators of the day, gave impassioned pleas in Congress in support of the cause of Greece. Several States recognized, in their legislative acts, the fact that a nation, Greece, was waging a fight for independence, and the parallel was shown and drawn, showing the comparison between the struggle waged by the Original Thirteen Colonies against England in the Revoluby the Original Thirteen Colonies against England in the Revolutionary War.

Samuel Gridley Howe, of a well-known Boston family, educator and physician, was Greece's greatest active champion in America. He served as surgeon in chief of the Green Fleet. George Jarvis, Jonathan P. Miller, Estiwick Evans, and others held active service

Jonathan P. Miller, Estiwick Evans, and others held active service in the ranks of the Greek patriots. When Howe returned to the United States he spread everywhere the call for aid for the Greeks, and the response was immediate.

In Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and other cities Greek relief funds were created and money, food, and clothing sent to Greece to aid the patriots. The cities of Wilmington, Del., Bristol, R. I., Hartford, Conn., and Springfield, Mass., raised large sums that were sent abroad to Greece. The undergraduate students at Yale University enthered $500 and Columbia University in New York University gathered $500, and Columbia University in New York City, the Theological School at Andover College in Massachusetts, and other educational institutions sent contributions. Students and other educational institutions sent contributions. Students and instructors could never forget the vast stores of learning that had come down to them from the days of Greece's Golden Age, and they were hopeful that their aid might, in some small measure, repay the great blessings that Greece has given the world in learning, art, and human development. Two churches in Boston each gave $300. On January 8, 1824, a large ball was held in New York City, tickets selling for $5 each. Over 2,000 attended the affair, and the entire proceeds was given to the Greek relief fund and sent to Greece. By the end of April 1824 New York City philhellenes, alone, had sent more than $32,000 to Greece, a considerable amount in those early days.

Influential families in America adopted young Greek orphans, refugees, that were left homeless on the battlefields of Greece. Many of these young boys later rose to high Government and professional positions in American life.

The Sons of Pericles memorial reflects, in entirety, the beliefs and the principles of the members of the order, an organization and the principles of the members of the order, an organization founded in America, the adopted country of their parents. It is fitting, also, that the Order of Sons of Pericles present to the people of Greece, from the citizens of the United States, this memorial in memory of American philhellenes, for it is a tribute from the citizens of one Nation, America, founded by men who from the citizens of one Nation, America, founded by men who struggled for the right of self-determination, religious freedom, and political representation; given by an organization, the Sons of Pericles, which has developed its program and growth on those principles; to a nation, Greece, whose history has been a continual struggle for those self-same principles and ideals.

The memorial has been erected as a friendly gesture of international amity and good will, in order to effect a closer understanding between the two Nations, the United States of America and Greece, and in the fervent hope of retaining and furthering those bonds of friendship now existent between the peoples of these nations.

We have endeavored to bring out, briefly, the struggle in Greece and her debt to the citizens of the United States of America. America also owes a debt of gratitude to those scores of American philhellenes who aided Greece.

LaGuardia, and others, including the program at the New York World Fair, 1939, at the dedication of the Palestine pavilion on Sunday, May 28, 1939.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I could not hear a word that the gentleman said.

Mr. BLOOM. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein speeches made by Senator King, Mayor LaGuardia, Governor Lehman, and others at the dedication of the Palestine pavilion at the New York World Fair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Postmaster General Farley, made to the Virginia Division of Postmasters, at Charlottesville, on yesterday.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, about every day we get a request to put in the RECORD a speech of Postmaster General Farley. Is he putting these speeches in the Record as Postmaster General or are they made as the Democratic national chairman in this tour he is making to try to find out who is going to be the next Democratic President?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. If the gentleman will read the speech I am sure he will get that information and I believe it will do him some good.

Mr. RICH. I am sure he has had more speeches put in the RECORD than any other man who ever held public

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, I was much amazed, as I suppose the membership of the House was, to learn that a distinguished Irish soldier and citizen was placed under arrest by our Government and held incommunicado in Detroit. This gentleman I know. He is a distinguished soldier and citizen of Ireland and a scholar. He has no intention whatever of either endangering the life or affronting the dignity of Their Majesties while here. It seems to me to have been a very stupid blunder on the part of our Government. If, during the early days of the critical period of our history when the Colonies were not only not recognized but totally discredited in the eyes of the world when we sent Franklin to France, the same thing had happened to him, God knows what might have happened to the American cause. Franklin created a new confidence in our cause and raised money.

There will be a meeting in my office this afternoon of a very substantial number of the Members of this House in order to find out just what the reason or the attitude of the Government or the Department that placed him under arrest was in the matter, and to insist upon carrying out the law as I understand it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Under what Federal law has he been arrested? Mr. McGRANERY. I do not know; none that I know of. [Here the gavel fell.]

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC LAW NO. 190 OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 3386) to amend Public Law No. 190 of the Sixty-sixth Congress, which has been referred to the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, be rereferred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississipppi?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to join in the protest made by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. McGranery] in protesting against the action of the Department of Justice in jailing in Detroit, Mich., a distinguished Irish citizen who is here on a lecture tour. He is here on a lecture tour just like Dr. Benes, the former President of Czechoslovakia, is here on a lecture tour, minding his own business. He is here on a valid passport. The action in detaining Mr. Sean Russell demonstrates the influence of the British Government in the United States when Scotland Yard can wire the Department of Justice in Washington to pick up an innocent man on the flimsy pretext that he may possibly do some harm to the distinguished guests who are coming here tomorrow. This move is designed to cast aspersions upon the Irish race in the United States. Our protest against the visit will be vocal; it will never be physical under the circumstances.

I hope there will be enough Members of this Congress to join with Mr. McGranery and some more of us in laying our protests before the State Department this afternoon. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein an address by Will H. Gibson, former secretary of state of the State of Idaho, on the subject of Public Education.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION OF COMMITTEE OR SUBCOMMITTEE TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAY. The parliamentary inquiry is whether or not the rule of the House which requires a committee of the House to obtain the permission of the House to sit during the sessions of the House applies to subcommittees of the various committees of the House.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky. the Chair will read the rule:

No committee, except the Committee on Rules, shall sit during the sitting of the House, without special leave.

Mr. MAY. I do not think the Chair quite understood my inquiry.

The SPEAKER. That rule applies also to any subcommittee of a legislative committee. It cannot sit without permission of the House.

Mr. MAY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Subcommittee No. II of the Committee on Military Affairs, relating to the Tennessee Valley Authority, be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROPOSED ANTARCTIC EXPEDITION

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, Mr. Harold D. Smith, has requested that we grant $340,000 with which to start another Antarctic expedition, which will ultimately cost ³ This Government has not accepted the provisions of the moratorium.

⁴ The United States holds obligations in the principal amount of $289,898.78, which, together with accrued interest thereon, are to be canceled pursuant to agree ment o, Apr. 14, 1938, between the United States and the Republic of Nicaragua, ratified by the United States Senate on June 13, 1938.

$1,000,000, and the President of the United States concurs in that request, as per his letter of May 26, which I insert here-

> THE WHITE HOUSE Washington, May 26, 1939.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives

Sir: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year 1939 in the amount of

The details of this estimate, the necessity therefor, and the reason for its transmission at this time are set forth in the letter of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, which is transmitted herewith, with whose comments and observations thereon I concur.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

We are going to be called upon in the Committee on Appropriations to grant this $1,000,000 to make another vacation trip to the South Pole. A hot thing to propose at this time. It seems to me, when we are two billion and a quarter dollars in the red for this year, and will be $4,000,000,000 in the red for next year, that if there ever was a piece of folly, this proposition is that, and why the President and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget should ask the Members of Congress to expend $1,000,000 to make a trip down to the South Pole I cannot understand. I hope that the Members of the House will turn down the request. I insert here the Budget Bureau's request to make the appropriation:

Bureau of the Budget, Washington, May 26, 1939.

The PRESIDENT,

The White House.

Sir: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year 1939, in the amount of $340,000, as

GOVERNMENT IN THE TERRITORIES

"Expenses, Division of Territories and Island Possessions: For an additional amount for expenses of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions in the investigation and survey of natural resources of the land and sea areas of the Antarctic regions, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, with out regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, or by contract, if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, rent, travelthe provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, rent, traveling expenses, purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers and periodicals, stationery, hire of automobiles, purchase of equipment, supplies and provisions, and all other necessary expenses, fiscal year 1939, to remain available until June 30, 1940, $340,000: Provided, That fuel, repairs, and emergency supplies may be contracted for in foreign ports: Provided further, That reimbursement may be made to individuals for expenditures for services and supplies, and for other expenses incurred subsequent to May 2, 1939, when such expenditures have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior (47 Stat. 1517; 48 Stat. 16; Executive Order No. 6726; Public, No. 61, May 2, 1939), $340,000."

This estimate of appropriation is to provide for the expenses of an expedition to the Antarctic regions for the purpose of making surveys and investigations of the natural resources of land and sea surveys and investigations of the natural resources of land and sea areas therein. The estimate covers the amount that will be required until the end of the fiscal year 1940. An additional sum will be needed in 1941 to return the members of the expedition to the United States or, in the event the project cannot be completed within a year, to provide provisions and other supplies for a longer period.

The foregoing estimate of appropriation is required to meet a contingency which has arisen since the transmission of the Budget for the fiscal year 1939, and approval is recommended.

Very respectfully,

HAROLD D. SMITH. Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

We have had more joy rides by this administration than any other administration. They seem to be devising means to spend, spend, spend. Is it not possible to stop Roosevelt spending? Stop him lending, stop him bending, for every New Deal device to spend, spend; or we will be wrecked, wrecked, wrecked. Will you help create jobs, not take any more joy rides?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the House, I wish to call your attention to the latest Presidential appointment which, according to this morning's papers, has been transmitted to the Senate for confirmation today. I refer to the appointment of one Archibald Mac-Leish as Librarian of Congress. MacLeish is one of the leading "fellow travelers" of the Communist Party today.

This appointment once more raises the vital and alarming issue of the Communist influence on appointments emanating from the White House. A few days ago the foremost "fellow traveler" of the Communist Party in the United States was appointed to a secretarial post in the Virgin Islands. That was Robert Morss Lovett who, according to the records, has been affiliated with at least 25 united fronts of the Communist Party. This newest appointee, MacLeish, ranks in importance as a "fellow traveler" not far behind Lovett.

Two years ago the Communist Party set up a united front known as the League of American Writers. This league held its annual congress only last Saturday in New York where its leading visiting speaker from abroad was one Louis Aragon, editor of the French Communist newspaper, Ce Coir, and admitted in the columns of the Daily Worker last week to be a Communist. MacLeish was one of the 23 signers of the call to the congress of 1937, which set up the League of American Writers. Out of the 23, 12 were wellknown Communists and some of the others were equally wellknown as "fellow travelers," including Robert Morss Lovett.

MacLeish has also been a member of the National Committee of the Medical Bureau to Aid Spanish Democracy, an organization shown by testimony before the Dies committee last year to be a united front of the Communist Party.

MacLeish was also a member of the National Advisory Committee of the American Youth Congress, another united front maneuver of the Communists.

MacLeish was also a member of the Motion Picture Artists Spanish Aid, along with sundry members of the Communist Party and other "fellow travelers."

Several years ago the Communist Party frequently denounced MacLeish as a Fascist. But that was before the new "line" of the present Communist Party's strategy was adopted. If his appointment as Librarian of Congress had been made back in that former period, the Communist Party's press would now be denouncing it with vehemence. However, now that the Communist Party has taken Mac-Leish to its ideological bosom, there will be nothing but prolonged applause for this appointment which sends one of its loyal friends into a most important public position.

It is high time that a final halt were called to this Communist penetration of government.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include an invitation on the part of the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department to bid on a treadmill for dogs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PICKETING IN DETROIT

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Also, Mr. Speaker, to include therein two short statements by former Representative Pettengill, of Indiana, and a short editorial from the Detroit Free Press.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE RIGHT TO WORK

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the attention of the House was by me called to the fact that here in Washington the Workers Alliance in convention assembled was demanding that the Congress provide the money to give every unemployed person in the United States a job. As given in the press, their slogan was "The right to work." For more than 2 years, in Congress and in many other places, I have been demanding that the right to work—a civil liberty and in the past there has been a great deal of talk by the Senate Civil Liberties Committee, and today by Attorney General Murphy, about the denial of civil liberties—be protected.

In the past, the Senate Civil Liberties Committee and, more recently, Attorney General Murphy, has been making a loud noise on the theory that employers denied to employees the right to work except under improper conditions or for a starvation wage. That committee has spent considerable money, a great deal of time, in attempting to show that employees have been persecuted, have been denied their civil liberties. So far as I have been able to learn, that committee never at any time expressed any concern over the denial to employers of the right to give work to employees.

Attorney General Murphy, while Governor of Michigan, used the National Guard of that State in a manner which resulted in the denial of the right to work. His words do not match and are not consistent with his actions.

At the present time, using the National Labor Relations Act as its authority, the National Labor Relations Board, John L. Lewis, and the organizations in which he is a power, are destroying civil liberties, are making it more and more difficult for men to work.

Many times have I called the attention of this House to the fact that John L. Lewis is seeking a monopoly over labor; that, if he continues on his course, the time will come, and that all too soon, when he will sell the worker to the industrialist as slaves were sold in the olden days; as cattle are sold in the markets of the world today.

On almost every possible occasion I have attempted to arouse this House to a realization of what is actually taking place; to point out the danger of our failure to amend the National Labor Relations Act, our failure to counteract the propaganda which has been put out by the Senate Civil Liberties Committee.

Today, shaping itself to public view, there is the coalition existing between some forces in the administration. John L. Lewis, the Communists, Earl Browder, their former candidate for President-all claiming to act under color of laws which we have enacted-which is steadily driving forward toward a united front, and which will present to the people of this country the issue, whether disguised or not, between those who believe in a constitutional form of government, such as has brought us our prosperity, which has established here for the worker living conditions better than anywhere else in this whole world of ours. These forces on the one side and on the other; those who believe either in communism or fascism; those who believe that government should control and operate all business activities; some of whom believe that what we need is a dictator and that the step toward that dictatorship is a third term for the present occupant of the White House. who has left behind him a record unparalleled for its deception, its waste, its extravagance, its corruption, its destruction of civil liberties.

We here in Congress have a responsibility which rests upon us, which we cannot, which we should not, desire to shirk or to avoid. Upon us rests the determination of whether or not our form of government shall be preserved or whether we shall aid, by now neglecting our duty, in the continuation of those forces which are none too gradually, which are most certainly, giving into the hands of Lewis and of bureaucrats the power to utterly destroy us as a nation.

Sustaining these views which I have expressed, let me quote from a former Democratic Member of this House, Hon. Samuel B. Pettengill, who so patriotically represented the Indiana district which adjoins the Fourth Michigan Congressional District. He recently wrote on this same subject, using as a title the words which I have so often called to your attention, "The Right to Work."

I read:

THE RIGHT TO WORK

A new political issue is in the making. It is the right to work. It is not in fact, new, but it is acquiring new and commanding interest. That is what makes issues.

The question is whether a labor monopoly, supported by public officials, and by violence, or the threat of violence, can compel a once free American to join a labor union and pay a fee in order to work, in order to live. A phase of that question is whether he must join a particular labor union.

John L. Lewis presents this latter question to the Nation. Can a soft-coal miner join the union of his choice? Mr. Lewis says no; he can't. He must join Mr. Lewis' union. He cannot join any other union. If he does he can't mine coal. He can't eat bread.

Bear in mind that Mr. Lewis was a sponsor of the Wagner Labor Relations Act. This act says that it is the public policy of the United States to protect "the exercise of workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing, for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment or other mutual aid or protection."

or protection."

This is sound public policy. The right of collective bargaining by workers as a counterbalance to collective bargaining by capital is a weapon labor must have either in its hand or behind the door. Without it we have seen too many examples of industrial tyranny.

But Mr. Lewis now denies to workers the right so guaranteed to workers. He is making war against a bill he sponsored, which is now the law of the land. Mr. Lewis, in effect, amends this law by saying it applies to no labor union but his own.

He defies State and National authority to guarantee to workers the "full freedom" to associate in unions of their own choice, and to designate representatives "of their own choosing." If they do not choose Mr. Lewis' union they can go hungry. Their mines cannot open.

He says in effect to the coal miners, "Join my union. Pay dues to me or you can't work. You cannot choose to associate with the Progressive Miners, nor with the American Federation of Labor. You cannot choose to belong to no union. You cannot choose to form an independent union.

"If you do any of these things, you can't work. My pickets will prevent you. If a Governor stops my pickets, I will drive the Governor out of office. Governors must take orders from me. You must pay tribute to my union or go without work. The money you pay I will use in large part, not for your benefit, but to organize steel, automobile, textile, farm workers. Then I will apply the same squeeze on the men in these industries."

If what Mr. Lewis is doing were done by employers and a com-

If what Mr. Lewis is doing were done by employers and a company union, the law and the White House would be upon their heads. Mr. Lewis proposes to freeze out all other unions. He won't have "any d—d labor organizer monkeying with his men." This telegram from the president of the Progressive Mine Workers to the President of the United States tells the story:

"We represent a majority of the employees in 224 mines formerly covered by the Appalachian agreement employing upward of 80,000 miners. We have been designated by them to be their bargaining agent. Under the Wagner Act neither these employers nor their agents can bargain with United Mine Workers of America covering their employees nor can they make closed-shop agreements with the United Mine Workers.

"The decision in the case of Progressive Mine Workers of America v. Kelly's Creek Colliery Co. should be read before negotiations are undertaken, as the United Mine Workers are seeking to circumvent this decision by their present demands for a closed shop and to eliminate the strike penalty clause.

"We know that you, as President, representing all of the people and not only a portion thereof, will not take sides with any party seeking to circumvent the Wagner Act, with knowledge of all the facts as herein stated. * * *"

Mr. Lewis is fighting for a blacklist of his own. If a combination of employers agree not to employ a member of Mr. Lewis' union, they do a lawless thing. Mr. Lewis can enjoin them from doing it. The courts will protect the worker in his fundamental right to work even if he belongs to a union the employers do not like. He can neither be fired nor his family starved to give up union membership. Such was the old blacklist—a weapon of industrial tyranny now happily outlawed.

industrial tyranny now happily outlawed.

But now that employers are forbidden to blacklist his workers,
Mr. Lewis now proposes to blacklist all other workers himself.
In one case employers deny the right to work of a man who belongs to a union. Mr. Lewis denies the right to work of a man who does not belong to a union, and in particular to his union.
Under the old deal some employers blacklisted the worker. Under the New Deal Mr. Lewis blacklists the worker.

Note this editorial from a recent issue of the Detroit Free Press. Detroit, as you know, had more than enough experience with the C. I. O. during the sit-down strikes of 1937. Not content with its experience over that period, not content with its repudiation in the Detroit city elections, and in the more recent State election of 1938, that organization still continues its activities. Similarly recent exploits by others were the picketing of a ball park and of the animal cages at the Detroit zoo. Note this editorial:

GETTING OUT OF HAND

Are not certain elements in the C. I. O. endangering the good will of the public, which was beginning to forget about their sitdown strikes and to regard them as a grown-up labor organization?

Certain recent events would give one the impression that individuals and groups in the C. I. O. are again acting on the principle of "the public be damned."

The recent attempt by some 2,000 sympathizers with the strikers at the Briggs Manufacturing Co. to picket Briggs Stadium and to keep the public, and even their fellow workers, from seeing a ball game, was one such incident.

Another was the beating up of the patrons of a beer garden, allegedly by members of the striking Briggs local, when the proprietor, acting within the law, ejected a member of the local for drunkenness and insulting women patrons.

And Saturday a dozen members of the W. P. A. Unemployed Workers Department of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. started to picket the animal cages at the Detroit Zoo.

All of these acts, and particularly the picketing of the ball park and the zoo, were attempts to keep the public, and many of their own fellow workers, from enjoying entertainment that had nothing whatever to do with the strike at the Briggs Manufacturing Co.

A whole labor organization is not to be indicted because of the acts of a few misguided members of it, but if the responsible leaders do not act to check this sort of thing, the public is likely to visit its resentment upon the U. A. W.-C. I. O. as a body.

When will Congress use its authority and its power to see to it that the civil liberties about which Attorney General Murphy so hypocritically prates are actually protected?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Thomas] who just spoke about the appointment of the Librarian, is present. I wanted to interrogate the gentleman and ask what he meant by "fellow traveler of the Communists"?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I will be glad to answer the

Mr. RAYBURN. And if he states upon his responsibility that this new Librarian is a Communist. I do not know him.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I may say to the majority leader that the Dies committee, which includes five members of the Democratic Party and two members of the Republican Party, has definite information to the effect that this man McLeish is a fellow traveler of the Communist Party.

Mr. RAYBURN. What does the gentleman mean by "fellow traveler"?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. A man who is absolutely sympathetic with the Communist cause, but for various reasons does not care to be a party member.

The gentleman does not accuse him of Mr. RAYBURN. being a Communist?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. It is exactly the same thing. Mr. RAYBURN. But the gentleman does not state that he is a Communist?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. It is exactly the same thing. Mr. RAYBURN. I asked the gentleman a question which he can answer by "yes" or "no."

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. He is aiding and abetting the Communist Party all the time, but for some reason does not want to become a member of the Communist Party.

Mr. RAYBURN. But he is not a Communist?

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Certainly the gentleman will not disagree with this point; that is, that the administration is now, and has been for some time, placing people in key positions who are either members of the Communist Party or fellow travelers of the Communist Party?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do deny it, and I think the gentleman's statement is little short of slander.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a somewhat lengthy list of the keymen of our New Deal administration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if that list is going to take up too much of the RECORD, we cannot afford to have that expense added onto the Government.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. It is a list of the keymen, many of whom are members of the Communist Party or who are Communist sympathizers. It will take up a considerable part of the RECORD, but I believe that the country is entitled to the information.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman include a definition of "fellow traveler"; one who goes along with?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In order to get the list of the keymen, including the Communist brethren and their sympathizers, into the RECORD I will do my best to do so, if the gentleman does not object to my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I object. [After a pause.] Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

THEIR MAJESTIES THE KING AND QUEEN OF GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, two of our colleagues have just addressed the House, as they most assuredly had the right to do, with respect to the arrest of some person at Detroit, and their remarks indicated that the possibilities are that he was detained because of some feeling upon the part of some American authorities that there might be a chance of his doing violence to the King and Queen in this country while they are visiting us. I do not think any real American would even attempt injury to our distinguished visitors and I am sure that every Member of this House would feel that if the President of the United States were visiting in England we would be entitled to and would have every protection of his life while there. I merely want to say upon my own responsibility that it is the duty of every American citizen to see to it that Their Majesties while here are adequately and amply protected, and I hope that no violence nor attempt at violence will be resorted to toward them while they are in this country of ours, because they are the representatives of a great nation. Their visit is one of friendship and good will and I trust and feel assured that all our people without regard to party, creed, or race will so receive them. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including therein a short editorial from the Green Bay Press Gazette, of Green Bay, Wis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a statement of the count through the fishways at the Bonneville Dam.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include the Gallup poll which was released on June 6.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and insert in the Appendix a letter to Frank R. McNinch, of the Federal Communications Commission, from Mr. Neville Miller, president of the National Association of Broadcasters.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—MEETING OF INTERNATIONAL STATISTICAL INSTITUTE IN 1940

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State to the end that legislation may be enacted to amend Public Resolution No. 46, approved August 9, 1935, to authorize and request the President to invite foreign governments to be represented by delegates at the twenty-fifth session of the International Statistical Institute, to be held in the United States in 1940, and to authorize an appropriation of the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for participation by the United States in the meeting.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, June 7, 1939.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute to make an announcement. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

MEETING JUNE 8 ON LIBERALIZATION OF SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, there will be a meeting in the House caucus room tomorrow morning at 10:30 of those Members of Congress who are interested in the liberalization of the present social-security bill with reference to pensions for the aged.

In this connection I call attention to my remarks of yesterday, which appear on pages 6683-6685 of the Record. This whole subject will be discussed at this meeting tomorrow, and we hope all who are interested in this most vital question will be present.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Are the Republicans invited; are the minority Members invited?

Mr. COLMER. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair recognize the gentleman from Kansas for part of the time on the bill? We have some demands for time on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, 2 hours are allowed for general debate. The gentleman from Kansas will be recognized for half of the time if the gentleman is opposed to the bill.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman from Kansas is not opposed to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If no other member of the committee is opposed to the bill, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas for 1 hour. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 1 hour, and the gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. Mr. Chairman, if there is any subject on which I should be really qualified to speak, that subject is cotton. I make this statement for the reason that I was born and reared on a cotton farm. I have picked cotton, I have ginned cotton, and in later years as a general merchant I have bought and sold thousands of bales of cotton. Let me preface my remarks today by saying that this is not a partisan matter. It is a matter affecting every section of the country and should be considered on the facts in connection with the purposes of the bill and what it will mean to the people of this country.

The whole matter resolves itself into a question of jute versus cotton. The purpose of the bill is to have cotton sold on a net weight basis instead of a gross weight basis which is now the policy and to set up standards of tare. By tare I mean bagging and ties used in baling cotton. At this time we are selling cotton on a gross-weight basis, and that is the reason we are using this heavy, bulky, wasteful, and disgraceful type of jute bagging in covering our cotton.

I have heard a good many Members speak about voting for or against this bill. There is only one excuse for any Member voting against this bill, and I challenge any Member of Congress who has a jute-bagging mill in his district, any member of the jute interests, or any other citizen of this country, to deny this statement-just one reason, and that is that you are interested in the manufacture of jute for the sole purpose of profit. You may say you are interested in the employees of the jute factories. I am not talking about jute in any other line except jute bagging. Perhaps there are 3,000 or 4,000 employees manufacturing jute bagging, but every employee in a jute factory is one less in a cotton factory. In the meantime the jute plants can convert their machinery into the manufacture of cotton bagging and continue to use these employees. Some Members state: "I have got to vote against the bill because I have a jute mill in my district." If you feel that way about it it is clearly up to you.

I am not quarreling with any Member who wants to vote against this bill, which means a vote against cotton farmers; that is up to him. I call attention, however, to the fact that we have in the South thousands of men, women, and children toiling and laboring in the cotton fields-and they have been all these years-while we use jute that comes from India to make this heavy type of bagging that no other country in the world uses, not even India, where jute is grown. What about cotton? Today we have 11,500,000 bales of perfectly good American cotton in the hands of the Government costing the taxpayers of this country $45,-000,000 annually for storage, interest, and other charges. In the meantime you permit to come in from India, a large cotton-growing country, a country that has taken the Japanese and other cotton markets from us, to import into this country 2,000,000,000 pounds of raw and manufactured jute.

This takes our own perfectly good American markets pounds for pound to the extent of 2,000,000 bales of American cotton. As far as I am concerned, may I say that we could get rid of the tremendous surplus we have if we could have our own markets for 5 years. However, this is a different matter we are talking about now.

I want to give some real facts and I would like to have you listen to them because I challenge any Member of Congress or any member of the jute interests to deny these facts which I am going to present to you in connection with this

Mr. Chairman, this is the only cotton country in the world that sells cotton on a gross-weight basis. This is the only cotton country in the world that uses this old, heavy, wasteful, and disgraceful jute. India is the country in which this jute is produced, but India does not use this type of jute in covering her cotton. India uses a neat burlap, made out of jute, weighing, bagging and ties, 15 pounds.

I make the further statement there is not another cotton country in the world that uses over 15 pounds of bagging and ties per bale; yet in the United States, because of the practice of gross-weight sale, the farmer puts on 21 pounds. He has to have something heavy to bring the tare allowance up to the 21 pounds. I would like to have you listen to this also: After this cotton leaves the farmer, the exporters patch an additional 9 pounds before sending it across the water to foreign countries. That means a total of 30 pounds of bagging and ties, while, as stated, in every other country it is sold on a net-weight basis, using only 15 pounds tare—bagging and ties.

I make the further charge that the American bale of cotton is the most disgracefully baled of any cotton in the world, and I would like to have somebody deny that. This chart shows a picture of a bale of American cotton that was unloaded in Liverpool. Ask the Department of Agriculture if it is not getting complaints every day or two from cotton buyers and cotton manufacturers in Europe about the wasteful and disgraceful baling of American cotton. They complain about this type bagging, and especially the waste because of the type of bale that we export, and they ask why we do not do something about the proper packing of our cotton? Call on the Department of Agriculture, and they will furnish you with these complaints, certainly many of them issued recently.

I make the further charge there is not another farm product in the United States that is sold on a gross-weight basis except cotton, and it is done for only one reason; and that is for the sole purpose of the forcing of the using of this old, heavy jute bagging.

I will make the further charge that the American bale of cotton carries the highest insurance rate of any bale of cotton in the world. Why? Because of the condition of the material used in covering the American bale. I can prove to you through the Department of Agriculture that the complaints which it receives from Europe state that when a fire starts, and they have lots of them in the warehouses, the fire always originates where the American cotton is stored rather than with cotton that is stored in these warehouses received from points in Europe. Look at this chart. There is the foreign cotton on that side, a neat package, and here is the disgraceful American cotton.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman show which is the foreign cotton and which is the American cotton?

Mr. FULMER. This is the foreign cotton on this side, covered with neat bagging, and this is the American cotton, this ragged looking stuff. That is where the fire starts. We have report after report to that effect. I can show you statements of various manufacturers in foreign countries which state that they are changing from American cotton to their own cotton on account of the disgraceful type of the American bale.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I think the gentleman's speech will be more informative if he will give us a little information before he proceeds with his main argument.

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I do not live in a cotton country and a lot of this is Greek to me. I want to get at the fundamental cause why we use this jute to cover our cotton or to bale it and they do not use that type in other countries. What does this do?

Mr. FULMER. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Yes, I want to find out why we have to put it up in that.

Mr. FULMER. Cotton is sold on a gross-weight basis with a 21-pound limit to the farmer and 30 pounds to the exporter. If the farmer does not put that amount on when he sells his cotton he loses whatever he fails to put on. If the exporter fails to patch on the additional 9 pounds, when they knock the 30 pounds off in foreign countries he would lose that many pounds actual cotton.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What requires the American cotton producer or seller to put it on?

Mr. FULMER. Because, as stated, cotton is sold on a gross-weight basis.

If the farmer would attempt to put on 21 pounds of ties and bagging made out of cotton, cotton bagging being higher than jute, it would cost too much, and as stated, we need only 15 pounds to properly cover a bale of cotton when sold on a net-weight basis.

This bill does not legislate against any material that can qualify under a 15-pound tare standard as proposed under this bill. In other words, it may be possible to use jute burlap, which is used in other cotton-growing countries. In that jute burlap sells for about the same price that cotton bagging would sell for, naturally, cotton farmers would use bagging made of cotton, knowing that we would consume, as stated, about 200,000 bales of our cotton.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the seller get paid for the jute that is put on his cotton?

Mr. FULMER. That is the point I am coming to. If the gentleman will just wait, I will explain it fully.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Is it not true that the reason this legislation has not been passed several years ago is that the jute industry is so well organized that it has prevented the passage of a law by which we can sell cotton on a net-weight basis.

Mr. FULMER. That is absolutely true. We are dealing with the biggest trusts in the world.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The passage of this legislation will stop the use of this 30-pound jute?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Unless this bill is passed cotton will continue to be wrapped in jute. The jute industry has not let us pass a law under which we can sell cotton on a net-weight basis. That is the situation. The law has to be changed so you can sell cotton upon a net-weight basis.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Is there any act of Congress under which that is done, or is it by a trade practice?

Mr. FULMER. At this time merely a trade practice which farmers cannot overcome, and that is why we need this legislation.

In Brazil, Anderson Clayton Cotton Co., of Texas, the largest cotton concern in the world, owns, I understand, 6 oil mills, and I do not know how many gins, and in every one of these gins they have high density gin compression and use 15 pounds of neat, nice, bagging, which makes a respectable bale of cotton. No wonder we are losing our foreign

The gentleman asked about the farmer getting paid for the bagging. One Member asked me, "Do you believe that we could explain to the farmer about not getting paid for his jute bagging?"

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

When this cotton is sold on a gross-weight basis, it includes the bagging, the ties, and the lint. It is just as if my friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] would sell a barrel of sugar in the wood weighing 318 pounds. The price is fixed on the net weight 300 pounds of sugar, and not on gross weight including the barrel. The barrel weighs 18 pounds, and there are 300 pounds of sugar. In grossweight selling of cotton, where a bale weighs 500 pounds, including bagging and ties, if the farmer receives 10 cents a pound he gets $50. You would say that he received 10 cents a pound for 21 pounds of perfectly useless bagging and ties that cannot be spun by the mill. It is thrown on the waste pile when the mill spins the cotton. Is there a man on the floor of this House that thinks manufacturers actually pay 10 cents per pound for this waste? Oh, no; that is fixed in the price.

I have here a list of numerous cotton manufacturers in this country, in Massachusetts, Maine, Rhode Island, and in the South, in every cotton manufacturing State, and they all state that they will pay the difference in price in buying on a net-weight basis. "If you pass this net-weight bill," they say, "we will pay the farmers the actual price that the lint is worth and not discount the price as in the case of gross-weight selling to take care of the bagging and ties, which, as stated, is waste.

Now, another thing. What about the saving under this bill? Take the statement of the gentleman from the Department of Agriculture, Mr. Kitchen, before the hearings in the Senate committee the other day.

Mr. Kitchen stated in using 15 pounds of bagging and ties it would mean a saving of $6,000,000 annually in the amount of freight. Insurance and waste would add an additional six to ten million. There is anywhere from $12,000,000 to $20,000,000 annually coming out of the price that the cotton farmer should receive in extra freight, insurance, and

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsyl-

Mr. WALTER. If I correctly understand the bill we are considering, any person who after the enactment of this bill, if it is enacted, packs cotton in anything other than a cotton bag is guilty of committing a crime.

Mr. FULMER. The gentleman is mistaken. If the gentleman will refer to the report of the Secretary he will find that it plainly states this bill does not legislate against any material on the face of the earth that comes within the 15pound tare allowance.

Mr. WALTER. The bill very specifically provides that if anyone bags or offers for sale or ships or delivers for shipment in interstate commerce cotton that is not in a cotton bag, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. FULMER. Oh, no; that is not right.

Mr. WALTER. I am referring to section 8.

Mr. FULMER. Show me where that refers to cotton

Mr. WALTER. It does not state "cotton bagging" but it states "Any person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act"-

Mr. FULMER. I do not yield any further. That is the trouble with these fellows who represent the jute sections and oppose a net-weight bill. This bill does not legislate against any materials. You can manufacture burlap from jute coming from India or you can manufacture paper if you can make paper that is strong enough to hold the cotton, but you cannot use this old, rough jute bagging that weighs more than 15 pounds including the ties.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman— Mr. FULMER. I do not yield any further.

Mr. WALTER. But the gentleman said something a moment ago which I do not believe he meant. I am not opposed to his bill. I just want to know whether or not this bill contains a penal provision with respect to any one who violates the provisions of this act.

Mr. FULMER. It would if you did not comply with the tare standard-bagging and ties-set up by the Secretary, which should not exceed 15 pounds. If you go and use the same old, heavy bagging and try to ship it in interstate commerce, you cannot do it, because you must come under the standards set up by the Secretary of Agriculture under the provision of this bill governing same. You cannot use this old raggedy, disgraceful type of jute now being shipped all over this country at the expense of the farmers and those who produce cotton.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 more minutes.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FULMER. In just a minute. I hope I have made the matter clear about the farmer getting paid for his bagging. If there is a man here who believes that the farmer receives 10 cents a pound for this 3-cents-a-pound bagging, he is mistaken. In Europe last year they put up 700,000 bales of cotton in bagging made out of cotton.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield. Mr. COOLEY. Is it not a fact that the farmers believe that they do get paid for all bagging and for the ties now being used in wrapping cotton?

Mr. FULMER. I will say to the gentleman that in past years a great many farmers believed that, but today you will find very few who do not know that they are being robbed, and they are wondering why they are facing eleven and a half million bales of cotton stored with the Government and another crop coming on and yet they are forced to use this heavy jute bagging.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman makes the statement that this a net weight bill-

Mr. FULMER. That is right.
Mr. COOLEY. Of course, it is a net-weight bill, but it is something more than a net-weight bill.

Mr. FULMER. Not a thing except to set up standards not to exceed 15 pounds bagging and ties.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman could accomplish what he has in mind with respect to requiring cotton to be sold on net weight in a bill much simpler than the one we are considering by simply providing that it should be sold on net weight instead of gross weight.

Mr. FULMER. Yes; I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. The jute people, every one of them, will vote for that type of bill. Why? Because when they go to the Secretary to set up standards, the paper people may come in with a paper covering, say, 12 pounds, the gentleman comes in with cotton bagging 15 pounds, and the jute people can come in with 21 pounds, and there is no way to keep them from setting up a 21-pound standard, and therefore, because of the cheapness of this disgraceful jute compared with cotton, it would still be used and all the waste, excess insurance. freight, and other waste would continue and, as usual, would come out of the cotton farmer. Any man who is against using this type of jute should not allow himself to be fooled into voting for that type of legislation.

Mr. COOLEY. If cotton is going to be sold on a net-weight basis, does it make any difference what the packing weighs; that is, if it is going to be sold on the net weight of the cotton?

Mr. FULMER. If you want to continue to sell on a 21pound basis, why sell on a net-weight basis, if you are going

Mr. COOLEY. The situation is just this: The farmers have been using this jute bagging for about 90 years or longer and they have been selling it on gross weight, and all the farmers in my territory believe that they are actually paid for the jute and the ties at the price for which they sell their cotton. Now, may I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. FULMER. First, I want to reply to that statement. If the gentleman will get the report he will find that we have the backing on this bill of every farm organization in the country; every agricultural commissioner of the South, including the National Farm Council, created sometime ago; the ginners; and everybody else, except the jute interests, because they realize that throughout all these years we have been robbing the cotton farmer by compelling him to use that which has been forced upon him.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield himself some additional time to answer a few questions?

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 additional

Mr. COOLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: If this bill is enacted into law and the farmer this fall attempts to sell his cotton wrapped in jute bagging, will not the cotton buyer, at the time of the sale, deduct the weight of the bagging and the ties and only pay the farmer for the net weight of the bale of cotton?

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman asked that question. As a matter of fact, this bill does not go into effect for 12 months after the bill has been passed. They will have opportunity to dispose of their cotton in that time, but suppose you still have cotton covered with old jute bagging. It could be sold on net weight, and the farmer would receive a net-weight price which would be higher than a gross-weight price, as stated by the cotton mills.

Mr. COOLEY. And when cotton is offered for sale, then the weight of the bagging and ties will be deducted from the weight of the bale of cotton.

Mr. FULMER. That is correct; but may I state to the gentleman, as the mills have stated here, they will pay the difference.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.
Mr. COLLINS. Do the cotton mills want this legislation?
Mr. FULMER. I have a list here, and every cotton mill in the country is in favor of this legislation for the reason that they could manufacture more cotton, and for the further reason this bill would cut out waste brought about because of this type of bagging.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. PEARSON. I had this morning a telegram from the Southern Cotton Ginners Association, expressing their opposition to this measure, stating in the telegram that if it is enacted into law, it would cost the cotton producers of this country $18,000,000 a year. I ask the gentleman if he will explain to me why the ginners express such strenuous opposition to this bill and whether or not it would in effect operate to cost the cotton producers a large amount of money rather than serve as a profit?

Mr. FULMER. During all of these years the jute people have sold through the ginners to the farmer, this jute, and they have had the ginners properly lined up against using anything except jute. The ginners recently have gone in with the National Farm Council, which is Oscar Johnson's organization; and I have a wire that for the first time out of all their meetings they have endorsed the net-weight bill. As stated to the gentleman here, and it is as plain as the nose on your face, there can be a tremendous saving because of the surplus bagging on which you pay freight all over this country and to Europe. The insurance also is the highest in the world. Let me state to the gentleman that when the mill strips that jute off they have to pick over the whole bale, because if any fibers are left in it it will be injurious, and with a cotton bagging, they can pull it off just like you peel a banana and the cotton is ready to

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. Do I understand that the jute bag weighs 21 pounds?

Mr. FULMER. The farmer puts on 21 pounds bagging and ties. The bagging now weighes 12 pounds on a bale.

Mr. HOLMES. And that is that deducted from the 500 pounds in the bale?

Mr. FULMER. No; not now, because it is sold gross weight, but the price is cut to make allowance for the 21 pounds of tare.

Mr. HOLMES. And this is going to be a net-weight bill?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. HOLMES. What difference does it make if you are going to sell 500 pounds of cotton whether you bag it up in jute or in cotton, or put it in the metal boxes, as long as you are selling 500 pounds of cotton?

Mr. FULMER. Here is the difference: If you put on the 21 pounds you are just going to pay the freight on useless tare all over the country, and the 9 pounds more which you put on for export you pay freight thereon to foreign countries. No other country in the world does this. India, where jute is produced at 16 cents a day labor, does not use this stuff; and why? Because they get less insurance, less freight, less waste.

Mr. HOLMES. The farmer does not pay that freight.

Mr. FULMER. Certainly he does.

Mr. HOLMES. F. o. b.?

Mr. FULMER. My friend, the farmer pays the freight on everything, going and coming.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I would like to ask the gentleman to inform the House if he knows—and I suspect he does about how many additional bales of cotton will be required in the United States if we supplant jute bagging with cot-

Mr. FULMER. We would consume about 200,000 bales of the lowest type of cotton we have, which would tend to make a better price for the higher-grade cotton.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I want to show you the burlap that is used in India and Russia and all these other cotton producing countries, which does not exceed 15 pounds, including the ties.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. On page 2 you define the word "cotton," and you limit it to cotton produced in the United States. Why does not this bill apply to cotton produced outside of the United States, in view of the fact that great corporations are now getting ready to ship Brazilian cotton, which can be produced cheaper, into this country?

Mr. FULMER. There has been just a little of that cotton shipped in. We are not worried about what may come-it is the losing of our foreign market.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman. I wish to say that as a member of the Committee on Agriculture I feel that this is the only sensible bill that that committee has so far reported out of the committee. All of the other bills and all the talk I hear in that committee is how to restrict, how to destroy American agricultural wealth, and all about benefit payments for the destruction of wealth. We will all soon be on relief if we continue that policy.

Here we have a bill which provides that we give the American market to the American people. We want to produce our own bagging for cotton. If we can produce it, why should we not produce it? This bill does not say that that bagging must be cotton. If you want to raise jute in the United States with which to pack this cotton for our friends in the South, you can do it, but we object to having that jute come in from India, where it is produced by men and women who just have a piece of cloth around the middle of their bodies, and then ask the American cotton growers to compete with that kind of labor.

Now, you tell me there is no harm done by it. I will show you some of the harm. That rubbish [indicating], amounting to 70 pounds on some bales. What does that mean? It means additional railroad transportation charges. It means shipping additional charges across the ocean. Not only that; it means additional handling charges. What else does it mean? It means additional storage charges for rubbish that is thrown into the wastebasket after we import it from a foreign country to compete with our own people.

We have 11,500,000 bales of cotton on hand that we could use for our own people, or else export it on an equally competitive basis, rather than to destroy its attractiveness by wrapping it in that kind of rubbish.

Let me explain the difference between this and putting it in a nice container. It is the same as when your wife goes into a store to buy a can of tomatoes. Will she buy a can where the juice has run out all over it, that is wrapped up in an old newspaper, or will she prefer one that is put up in a nice container, a container that tells her that there is quality on the inside of the can?

Mr. WALTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. Why is it necessary to have legislation to use cotton for bagging? Why can it not be done now? There is no prohibition against it.

Mr. LEMKE. For the same reason that it was necessary years ago to get Federal inspection of our meat to encourage foreign buyers and protect our own people.

Before the Federal inspection law, we were discriminated against by buyers of foreign nations, because other nations had inspection laws. We should not permit the southern farmer to be deceived and made to believe that he is being paid for this rubbish when in fact he is made to pay for extra transportation and handling charges as well as storage charges. This because a few do not wish to change existing conditions and wish to make a profit out of rubbish that is thrown into the wastebasket. But we must always protect and should always protect the farmer. We have not given sufficient protection to the farmer.

Do you know what we have in that committee of which I am a member? You have 14 Democrats and my friend Mr. Pierce, from Oregon. Then you have a few Republicans and the rest all belong to a past age that think you are going to continue to load the farmers' backs here at home with a lot of extra charges and rubbish that he is incapable of carrying.

Mr. WALTER. I may not have understood the gentleman, but I do not think he has yet told me why cotton is not used today.

Mr. LEMKE. Because those who are furnishing this rubbish, importing it, produced by peon labor, think they must use this class of bagging-rubbish-in order to compete with cotton bagging. They think in that way they can do it a little cheaper. As has been pointed out, they have fooled the poor cotton farmer who produces cotton, that he is being paid for that extra rubbish, when, as a matter of fact it is thrown into the wastebasket. In fact, the farmer has to pay freight and railroad charges on 70 pounds of waste where he ought to pay it on only 10 pounds. Then he has to pay extra storage charges, because it takes a lot more storage space. Again, two carloads of cotton wrapped in this jute bagging could be loaded into one car if properly compressed and wrapped in proper wrapping, as provided for in this bill. Why put all of this extra burden on the shoulders of the cotton farmer?

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. I do not know where the cheap wages are paid, certainly not in those American factories where the jute is being processed, because I know for a fact that the men today engaged in the manufacture of jute bags are paid far in excess of any wage received by any workers anywhere in America.

Mr. LEMKE. We are not objecting to those jute factories. What we are objecting to is their shoving this kind of rubbish on the cotton producers of the South or anyone else.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for some information?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am very much in accord with the gentleman from North Dakota that we ought to use American cotton or American production instead of Indian jute; but we have a reciprocal-trade agreement with Great Britain, including India, and we have a reciprocal-trade agreement with Brazil. Will not these reciprocal-trade agreements do cotton immeasurably more harm than this small amount of jute we are talking about?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. LEMKE. I answer the gentleman by saying that there are at the Speaker's desk two petitions. If he will sign petition No. 5 for cost of production these trade agreements will no longer exist to the disadvantage of the American farmer. Discharge petition No. 6 relates to refinancing the farmer. I hope every Member of Congress will sign petitions 5 and 6 for cost of production, and the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. Then we shall not need the Committee on Agriculture to help the farmers. Then they will help themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Clason].

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, once again the specters of cotton and jute come before us at this session of Congress. We should remember in the first instance that the cotton people of the South have been satisfied to use this jute bagging for the past 90 years. Does it not seem strange that at this particular time they desire to change from jute bagging to some other type of covering? We must therefore look for a reason.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CLASON. Not at the present time. I have only 10 minutes.

The reason, of course, has to do with money. This bill will help one company in New Orleans, La., the Lane Co., which at the present time is receiving a subsidy of from 26 to 28 cents each for bale covers made of cotton. In other words, they cannot compete with the jute industry, so the Department of Agriculture, out of funds appropriated for the purpose of finding new ways of using cotton, is giving this company 26 to 28 cents on the cost of each covering for cotton bales. Once you start using cotton under a law requiring that cotton be used for the purpose of covering these bales and the 26- or 28-cent subsidy is removed, the southern farmer is going to get stuck with the subsidy, and he is going to get stuck with a good deal more. I say this for the reason that I have been studying the testimony of cotton farmers given before a United States Senate committee this year.

I have before me the testimony of Damon Heddon, a small cotton farmer of Tennessee who says that he lives in the largest cotton-producing section of Tennessee. At the present time he says they pay $1.25 for bagging and ties for a bale of cotton. That is the cost of bagging and tying a bale so far as materials are concerned. In addition to that he states that he is allowed a weight of 21 or 22 pounds. Let us assume that it is 21 pounds. He is allowed 21 pounds peale of cotton as tare. On this tare he is paid the price of the cotton. Let us assume that the price of cotton is 9 cents a pound. He is paid 9 cents for each of these 21 pounds of jute covering, or $1.89. What is this man's opinion? And he is a dirt farmer and knows what he is talking about. He says:

It is my opinion that under this bill before us today this farmer will not only lose the $1.89 he has been getting for the bagging and ties, but he will also lose the $1.25, his original investment, making a total loss of $3.14 per bale.

This is what it would cost the cotton farmers of the South, figuring on the basis of a 10,000,000-bale crop—$31,400,000 every year. That is what this bill will do in practice.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. I wonder if the gentleman would restate those figures? He surely does not mean that the farmer is going to lose $3.14 a bale.

Mr. CLASON. Yes; $3.14 a bale.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does the gentleman think that the bighearted spinners of this country who are purchasing this cotton are paying the farmers 9 cents a pound for this jute covering when jute does not bring anything like that on the open market? I presume the jute could be bought for 1 cent a pound on the open market.

Mr. CLASON. My figures are based on the fact that on the 21-pound tare the farmer is paid the rate of cotton. Assuming the price of cotton is 9 cents a pound, it would mean a loss to him of $1.89 on the weight of the bagging and $1.25, the cost of the bagging and ties, or $3.14 for every bale.

I think the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley] hit the nail on the head when he pointed out the reason for the provisions on page 3 of this bill requiring a particular weight for the covering of the bales of cotton.

The reason, of course, is because this bill is written for the purpose of protecting the Lane Co. and others who are manufacturing cotton covering. It is not for the benefit of the farmers. If it were, you would strike out every sentence in this bill which has anything to do with stating how much weight there should be per yard for the covering.

Let us see what the situation is both here and abroad. For 90 years we have been shipping our cotton abroad with this jute bagging. Over in Europe the cotton is covered with another jute product. Over there they cover it with burlap, a much finer product. Very little cotton is covered with cotton cloth or anything made out of cotton. Practically the world over it is covered with some sort of product made from jute.

There have been some other arguments made here. It was stated, for instance, that every man who is thrown out of employment in the jute mills of America will be put to work in some cotton mill down South. Is that any kind of American argument to make? If that is the argument this bill is based on, it ought to be voted down unanimously, because any man who is now employed and has good gainful employment at high American wages, and has had such employment for years, is entitled to keep his job. You will have to give us some sort of reasoning that is not as specious as that one. Do we want to throw a man out of employment in New York City, Philadelphia, or Springfield, Mass., in order to put that man to work for the Lane Co. down in New Orleans, and pay a subsidy of 26 cents through the Department of Agriculture? That is what is back of this bill.

We are trying to sell our cotton in the foreign markets. The pending bill prevents cotton from any foreign country entering the United States. The bill was drawn having that purpose in view. It so happens that there is a small amount of cotton that comes from Egypt and other places into the United States. This bill would prevent any of that cotton from coming in here unless it happened to be baled in accordance with the United States standards, which would be very unlikely. This being so, the cotton farmer wants to ship his cotton abroad. He tells the cotton farmers and producers abroad: "You cannot ship into the United States. All cotton sold in the United States must be raised here. But we want to sell cotton in your market, Egypt, India, and elsewhere, and we want to sell there our cotton goods." How long do you think your reciprocal-trade agreements are going to stand up under any such doctrine?

If you will look at section 3 you will find that no cotton can be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce, and they have it so defined that it cannot be shipped intrastate, unless it comes up to these standards. If that is the basis, then we ought to tell the Japanese to keep their toothbrushes out of the United States; we should tell every other nation, "Do not think you can ship and send anything into the United States," because what is good for cotton is good for the producers of potatoes, oranges, sugar, or anything else. What works for one crowd should work for all the rest of us.

They tell us this is going into effect within 12 months to 2 years; that everything sold after that has to be sold in conformity to this particular United States regulation which, of course, means cotton. The Government owns at the present time 11,000,000 bales of cotton, and I think one would have to be a pretty big optimist to believe the Government will be able to get rid of those 11,000,000 bales during the next 2 years. Yet under this bill the United States Government itself has got to cover not only these 11,000,000 bales but every other bale it buys this year which happens to be covered with jute bagging. It so happens you have not got in your crop this year and you have not your standard set up. So every bale of cotton that is raised this year will be covered in all probability with the good old jute bagging you have lived with for 90 years and which the farmers have found very satisfactory. When these regulations go into effect somebody has got to pay to cover the 12,000,000 bales that you produce this year with your new standard cover before it can go into interstate commerce, unless you sell at a lower price than the market for standard covered cotton.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). That motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Gilchrist].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I am for the pending bill, and the Committee on Agriculture is for the pending bill, because it protects American cotton against the jute which comes from Hindu India. We are for the protection of American products, and I believe this should be extended to American agricultural products as well as manufactured products. The American market belongs to the American farmer. That is the first reason I am for the bill.

I am for the bill also because it leads to honesty and fairness in commercial markets. Mr. Chairman, when you or someone else from Montana buys whisky, he knows exactly how much is in that bottle, because it must be stated on the label. When you go over and buy bread you know exactly how much bread is in the loaf. It is the net weight that counts. For us to know just how much we are getting when we buy anything can do no harm. For us to know net weight in a bale of cotton can surely do no harm. Let the package show how much it weighs.

I am for it on another ground. I like to buy things in nice packages. For example, I like to buy my neckties and suspenders wrapped very nicely and neatly. This appeals to my aesthetic sense. I like to buy candy and perfume the same way. You Democratic gentlemen on the other side of the aisle always like your wives and sweethearts wrapped in nice packages.

Mr. Chairman, joking aside, we ought to protect American industry and American products.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with great reluctance that I rise in opposition to this bill. The author of this measure, the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Fulmer], is a very dear friend of mine, and I know that he is sincerely interested in this measure. I also know that in his heart he believes that this measure will be of great benefit to the cotton farmers of the country. I have been a member of the House Committee on Agriculture during my entire service as a Member of Congress. From time to time the measure before us has been considered by our committee. If I were convinced that this bill would materially benefit the cotton farmers of this country I would not hesitate to give it my support, but I have not been so convinced.

I feel that I am in a position to view this matter rather impartially. I have a large constituency of cotton farmers. Cotton is one of the principal cash crops of my district. I have in my district a jute factory which employs from 500 to 600 men in the manufacture of jute bagging. Not being convinced that this measure will bring substantial benefit to the cotton farmers of the Nation, I do not feel that I would be justified in casting a vote the effect of which would be to close the jute factory, throw five or six hundred of my constituents out of jobs, completely destroy the business of the employers of these men, and visit great financial loss upon the entire community in which the manufacturing plant is located. With cotton farmers and workers in a jute manufacturing plant in my district, I have given this matter careful and serious thought and at all times have tried to consider it fairly and impartially.

In discussing this measure my distinguished friend from South Carolina has emphasized the net-weight features of the bill, but he has placed more emphasis upon other provisions of the measure and other entirely extraneous matters, and has actually beclouded the real questions involved. He refers to the bill as "the net-weight bill," hoping, of course, to sell this Committee on the idea that selling by net weight is preferable to selling by gross weight. If this were, in fact, a net-weight bill and nothing more, I should be very glad to support it; but even then, coming from a cotton district, it would probably be difficult for me to explain to the cotton farmers, who have for more than a hundred years sold their cotton on a gross-weight basis, just why the change was considered desirable.

The situation is just this: All through the years cotton farmers have sold their cotton on a gross-weight basis, and when a cotton farmer carries his cotton to market, wrapped in heavy jute bagging, it is weighed, and he is paid the prevailing market price for that cotton, including the bagging and ties, and no deduction whatever is made on account of the type of bagging used. The bagging and ties are weighed just as if they were cotton. Whether or not the farmer is actually paid for the bagging and ties, he feels and believes that he is being paid for them. If this bill is enacted, the weight of the bagging and ties will be deducted from the gross weight of the bale of cotton, and the farmer will believe, whether it is true or not, that this act is depriving him of something which he has heretofore received. I am not aware of any interest in this measure on the part of farmers in my district. Although I have been a Member of Congress since 1934, I do not now recall having received a single letter from a farmer in my district asking me to vote for this bill. On the other hand, I have received numerous letters and telegrams from those engaged in the cotton trade in opposition to the measure.

The gentleman from South Carolina in discussing this measure has had a lot to say about high-density gins. There is not one word in this bill about high-density gins, and discussion of high-density gins is entirely extraneous. My friend from South Carolina has exhibited a picture of American cotton and foreign cotton. The picture evidently was taken in a foreign country. I believe he stated that the picture was taken in Liverpool. He failed to call attention to the fact that the bales of American cotton shown in the picture had reached the end of their journey and had been cut for sampling on all sides. Buyers of cotton do not rely upon samples drawn by other buyers. Each buyer rips the bale open and draws his own sample and after a bale of cotton has exchanged hands a number of times the bagging is pretty well sliced to pieces. Neither did my friend call attention to the fact that the American cotton in the picture, after having been cut many times for sampling, had been placed in a high-density compress and pressed into about one-half of its original size. Of course, the American cotton appears to be a very ragged package under such circumstances, especially when placed by the side of foreign cotton neatly wrapped in burlap bagging which has never been cut for sampling and probably never is cut for sampling as is the case in this country. I suppose that the person who took the picture for my friend would naturally have selected the most ragged looking bale of American cotton he could possibly find as he would be anxious to accentuate the difference in appearance. The truth is that when American cotton comes from the gin wrapped in jute bagging it is not a disgraceful looking package. It is, in fact, a very neat looking package. But after the cotton buyers take their knives from their pockets and slice it from one end to the other, cutting the jute bagging all to pieces, the bale, of course, looks ragged. If American cotton were wrapped in cotton bagging and then knifed from one end to the other by cotton buyers in this country, when it reached Liverpool I doubt if the package would have a much better appearance than cotton which is wrapped in jute. The truth is, jute bagging is much stronger than cotton bagging.

We are not just dealing with a net-weight bill, as I have heretofore pointed out. The fact is, and I am sure that the gentleman from South Carolina will have to admit, that the real purpose of this bill and the paramount purpose he has in mind is to outlaw this heavy-weight jute bagging. The bill does not in any way guarantee or give any assurance that American cotton will hereafter be wrapped in cotton bagging. Suppose we outlaw this heavy-weight jute bagging, what would be the result? Suppose we pass this bill and close the mill in my district and in Congressman Dar-DEN'S district, and other jute mills in this country, what will then be the situation? In the first place, we will add to the army of the unemployed and to the relief rolls of the Nation. We will, for all intents and purposes, actually confiscate by making useless the machinery now installed in these mills in different sections of the country. At the same time American cotton will not be wrapped in bagging made of American cotton, but will be wrapped in burlap bagging, which is made of jute which comes from the same source that this heavy-weight bagging comes from.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. PACE. Does not the gentleman know that the jute plant in his district at almost nominal cost can change its machinery to manufacture cotton bagging instead of jute bagging and that it will not throw anybody out of work?

Mr. COOLEY. I know quite to the contrary. I understand that all the machinery in the jute mill in my district is made and designed to make this heavy jute bagging and that the machinery cannot be used for any other purpose. The owners of the mill tell me that the machinery would have to be junked in the event of the passage of this measure.

If we could write a provision in this bill which would require the selling of American cotton on a net-weight basis and a provision which would require that every bale of American cotton be wrapped in bagging made of American cotton it would appear that such a measure would be beneficial to cotton farmers only to the extent that it would provide a new use for American cotton which would result in depleting the surplus now on hand. I understand that even if the entire crop of American cotton were wrapped in cotton bagging it would take only 150,000 or 200,000 bales to do the job the first year. The second year the cotton bagging would be re-processed and the amount of cotton required would be around 40,000 to 50,000 bales annually after the first year.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How can the Government sell these 12,000,000 bales of cotton to foreign countries with jute around them if this bill is passed?

Mr. COOLEY. If the cotton is not disposed of until after the effective date of the bill I understand that it will be a violation of the law to sell it if it is wrapped in jute bagging.

Mr. FULMER. As a matter of fact, the gentleman's statement is not correct. Every bale of that cotton that is baled now or hereafter or between now and the time the bill goes into effect with that jute bagging on it would be sold either at gross or net weight.

Mr. COOLEY. What are you going to do about the provision which provides that no covering shall exceed 14 ounces per square yard?

Mr. FULMER. Hereafter every bale will have to have that.

Mr. COOLEY. But the bill does not say that.

Mr. FULMER. Yes it does.

Mr. COOLEY. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that when this bill became law it would be unlawful to sell a bale of cotton wrapped in any bagging which exceeded in weight 14 ounces per square yard and this heavy jute bagging certainly exceeds 14 ounces.

Mr. FULMER. If placed in a cotton gin after this bill goes into effect but if it is now in this country-

Mr. COOLEY. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] pointed out the situation that might exist if the Government failed to dispose of the stock on hand and failed to dispose of the current crop and asks whether or not this bill would be applicable to that cotton which might be sold after the effective date.

Mr. POAGE. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. POAGE. If the gentleman will refer to the language of the bill at the bottom of page 3 and at the top of page 4 he will find that the measure makes it unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any bale of cotton ginned after the effective date of the United States official cotton tare standards on which the bagging and ties or patches do not conform with such United States official cotton tare standards.

Mr. COOLEY. After the effective date. Mr. POAGE. The present cotton crop was not ginned before the effective date.

Mr. COOLEY. But the situation still might exist that the Government might have a loan on cotton grown in the

Mr. POAGE. But it could not have been ginned after the effective date.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. On page 2 why should the word "cotton" apply only to cotton produced in America? You are going to permit foreign cotton to be shipped in these ragged jute bags if you pass this bill.

Mr. COOLEY. I do not know that there is anything in the bill to prohibit that.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to my distinguished friend from

Mr. PACE. Does the gentleman know of a single bale of cotton on which the United States Government has a loan that has not been ginned?

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly not. The question is absurd and answers itself.

Mr. PACE. Why does the gentleman say then that we could not sell the loan cotton, when this bill does not apply to a bale of cotton that has heretofore been ginned?

Mr. COOLEY. I did not say that. I said any cotton wrapped in jute bagging which might be on hand after the effective date of this act-it would be unlawful to sell it.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman does not contend that now?

Mr. COOLEY. And then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE | called my attention to the fact that this is applicable only to cotton ginned after the effective date of the act.

Mr. PACE. But the gentleman did not retract his statement made to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. COOLEY. Well, I will retract it now, if that will please the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman know whether or not there is any plant or any section of the country that is exclusively manufacturing these cotton bags; in other words, if this bill is passed, will it favor any particular group or any particular section of the country?

Mr. COOLEY. Some gentleman has stated there is a manufacturer of cotton bagging in this country, but I do not know where that plant is located. I think the suggestion was made that it was in New Orleans.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. So they would practically have at the very beginning a business exclusive to themselves?

Mr. COOLEY. Not necessarily for cotton bagging, no; because, as I stated before, and I think the gentleman from South Carolina will agree, a burlap bagging of the same weight as the cotton bagging can be manufactured much cheaper than the cotton bagging can be manufactured. The point I am trying to make is that I honestly believe the bill will not do what the gentleman from South Carolina thinks it will do.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. My point is this, that the moment this bill becomes a law and goes into effect, the business of covering these bales of cotton would immediately go to this place that manufactures these cotton bags now?

Mr. COOLEY. To manufacturers of cotton bagging, and perhaps burlap bagging, which may hereafter be manufactured but in the meantime it would absolutely outlaw the heavy jute bagging.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman knows that there are lots of places in this country that can manufacture cotton bagging.

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. And it would not give a monopoly to any-

Mr. COOLEY. Certainly not. I did not mean to suggest that.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. CLASON. If we have bales of cotton, some wrapped in jute, contrary to the then existing law, and some wrapped according to the then existing law, the bales of cotton owned by the Government and wrapped contrary to law, will not bring as much in the market as the new type?

Mr. COOLEY. According to the argument of the author of this bill, that is correct.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. Does the gentleman know whether or not that cotton bagging is a patented article?

Mr. COOLEY. I do not suppose that it is.

Mr. TERRY. Is it not a fact that any factory can manufacture the cotton bagging?

Mr. COOLEY. Oh, there is no argument about 'that. Anybody that owns the machinery and can get the cotton can manufacture cotton bagging, but I say that I do not believe cotton bagging will be used. Further, the Department of Agriculture is now subsidizing the manufacture of cotton bagging and when they do that they are taking business from the manufacturers of other types of bagging.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman know what additional cost it will require for any manufacturer making jute bags to transform his factory and manufacture cotton bags? What part of his machinery would have to be exchanged for other machinery?

Mr. COOLEY. They tell me the entire machinery will have to be thrown aside, that they cannot use the machinery now used in manufacturing heavy jute bagging to manufacture either burlap or cotton bagging.

Mr. RICH. Is it possible for them to mix the cotton and the jute in their manufacture?

Mr. COOLEY. I cannot answer that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. How many bales of cotton would be required to furnish the necessary cotton bagging?

Mr. COOLEY. If all of the American cotton were wrapped in cotton bagging, the estimates run from 150,000 to 200,000 bales of cotton for the first year, but the fact remains that even though 150,000 to 200,000 bales are required the first year, after that that cotton would be reprocessed and remanufactured into bagging and be used again, and they tell us, that the second or the third year, only from 30,000 to 40,000 bales of cotton would be used if the entire American cotton crop were wrapped in cotton bagging; but no one denies the fact that burlap bagging can be purchased even now, with cotton selling at the present price, at a much cheaper price than can cotton bagging be purchased, and so the net result of this bill will be, as I see it, to force the use of burlap bagging, which is likewise an imported article, and it will not force the use of cotton bagging. I have several communications here in respect to this matter, which I shall include as a part of my remarks under unanimous consent to extend and include them, and they are as follows:

You will also note that we again called attention to the important fact that while the bill is intended to bring about the use of cotton bagging through limiting the weight of tare, this result would not be accomplished. Light-weight burlap, which meets tare specifications of bill, made exclusively in foreign countries, would be substituted because it is far cheaper than cotton bagging. The business of covering the American crop would, therefore, be taken away from American manufacturers such as ourselves and given to foreign manufacturers and foreign labor. In view of these facts we hope you will oppose this bill. With sincere regards.

Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
DEAR MR. COOLEY: We wired you this afternoon as follows:

"We urgently request you oppose H. R. 57, Fulmer net-weight cotton bill, when it is brought up for vote, probably tomorrow. We believe it will really hurt our cotton farmers rather than help them. Letter follows."

At the present time the average bale of cotton in our section has 12 pounds of jute bagging on same and is sold on a gross weight, 12 pounds of jute bagging on same and is sold on a gross weight, whereas cotton bagging only weighs 4½ pounds to a pattern, or a difference of 7½ pounds between the two weights of bagging in question. The cost to the farmer in our section for jute bagging and ties is $1 per bale, and this difference in weight, as it now stands, at the present price of cotton, pays for all of the bagging the farmer uses. The cost of ties in either case will be the same.

After the first year this cotton bagging will be reworked and used again as covering for cotton, thereby reducing the actual number of bales each year consumed in this channel to a minimum. As we understand it, the Government will have to continue to subsidize the producer of the cotton bagging in order to make it reasonable the producer of the cotton bagging in order to make it reasonable enough in price to be used to cover cotton. If H. R. 57 becomes a law, it is mandatory that cotton covering be used; and if the Government then discontinues the subsidy to the producers of cotton bagging, the cost of covering for our lint cotton will then double. In other words, it will act as a boomerang.

We cincerely trust that you will use every effort to oppose this bill. With all good wishes and kind personal regards from the writer, we beg to remain, Yours very truly,

R. S. OLIVER. Sales Manager.

It seems to me that it is plain, when you consider that this bill requires that bagging shall weigh a certain number of ounces per yard, an effort is being made to regulate the use of bagging, with the idea of either forcing the use of a certain type or excluding the use of a certain other type.

It is perfectly plain that the purpose is to exclude the use of any jute bagging, which the farmers have used through-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Nichols].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to state to the committee that I do not know exactly what the result of the passage of this legislation would be, but if I understand the aim of the bill, whether or not that aim is accomplished, it is to make it desirable and make it necessary that cotton bagging be used to wrap cotton bales. In the name of common sense, what cotton farmer, what Member of Congress representing a cotton district, what American citizen, as a matter of fact, who must be interested in one of our largest export products, can say that he would not support a piece of legislation the purpose of which is to provide that cotton should be wrapped in cotton? Is there a man on this floor who can tell me in any degree of seriousness that that would hurt the American cotton farmer? Of course not. If it were possible to put up every commodity produced in the United States, and package that commodity in its own self, it would simply increase the domestic consumption as well as the foreign consumption of that commodity. What is wrong with that? I do not want to see the jute mills close, but there are only about 12,000,000 bales of cotton produced in the United States; and that is a liberal estimate. Certainly my friends from the jute manufacturing centers of the United States will not tell me that those jute mills are surviving upon the production of jute to wrap 12,000,000 bales of cotton of the character of that in which cotton bales are wrapped. I am ready to agree that it might affect it some, but I know of no jute mills which manufacture simply this material and no other jute products. I have been laboring under the impression that twine string and other strings, cords, burlap, and the like were produced in the jute mills of this country. Some of my friends would have you think that to pass this devastating law, the purpose of which is to increase the consumption of cotton in the United States, a commodity that everyone admits now is in excess production in this country, would close down the jute mills of this country. It would do no such thing.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield briefly.

Mr. PATRICK. I want to vote for everything that will help the cotton farmer. As I understood Mr. Cooley, he stated that if this law goes through it will not help increase the sale of cotton.

Mr. NICHOLS. Well, I do not know. My distinguished friend [Mr. Cooley] is afraid that this will not help the cotton farmer. Is he afraid it will hurt him? No one will say that it will hurt the cotton farmer. Now, you have to vote against this bill upon some other premise than that. It would not increase the use of jute in the United States, would it? Certainly not. The worst that can happen is that it will increase the consumption of cotton if a single cotton bag is put on a bale of cotton that is now covered by [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Mills].

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor at this time not with the intention of trying to persuade any of you to vote for this bill or against it, but I want to give you the advanage of my experience and observations as a cotton farmer.

I want to call attention to one point that you have overlooked, and that is when I haul a bale of cotton to the market, I might think I am receiving payment for 21 pounds of jute. In fact, that is not so. I will tell you why it is not so. The cotton mills know specifically when they get ready to buy cotton, that they are buying net weight. Therefore, a 500-pound bale of cotton at 8 cents a pound will bring $40. When you subtract 21 pounds, which is allowed the cotton producer, and 9 pounds which it allowed to the man who transports it, or a total of 30 pounds, you have a net weight of 470 pounds. Divide 470 pounds into $40 makes the cotton worth 8.3 cents a pound. In other words, the price of cotton is based upon actually what the cotton buyer is receiving in net weight.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. When the price is made by the cotton manufacturers in this country, the price is discounted to take care of the surplus that is not put on in any other country in the world. In the foreign price they apply the average price to take care of the cotton instead of paying for this bagging.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. He is exactly correct.

I want it to be well understood that I am a cotton farmer and I am speaking for the cotton farmer, therefore I believe the American farmer is entitled to the American market.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. RICH. As I understand it the English manufacturers pay for the net weight. Does this not apply to the American manufacturers also?

Mr. MILLS. That is correct. Mr. RICH. He pays for the net weight also?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. COOLEY. If the gentleman will yield, does not the gentleman understand that even though this bill becomes a law that it will be much cheaper to use jute burlap in wrapping American cotton than it would be to use cotton bagging even at the present cheap price for cotton?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I am not certain on that point. I will be happy to have the gentleman from South Carolina answer that question.

Mr. FULMER. I may state to the gentleman that if he will call up the Department of Agriculture and ask for the facts with reference to the use of jute burlap on a competitive basis with cotton, and find out the advantages to be gained from the use of the light cotton covering in place of the heavy jute, he would come to the conclusion that on a competitive basis cotton would be used instead of burlap.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question?

Mr. FULMER. Yes. Mr. COOLEY. Is it not a fact that the Department of Agriculture is now spending thousands of dollars and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars trying to put cotton into competition with burlap bagging?

Mr. FULMER. No. It is simply because we are selling on the gross weight, and you cannot put on a light weight covering and sell on the gross weight basis.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. I yield.

Mr. WALTER. I am in receipt of a telegram from some people who are interested in American cotton, from which I want to read this statement:

We are firmly of the opinion that if the method of selling raw cotton is changed from gross weight to net weight it will result in imposing a costly burden on American cotton growers due to very slight likelihood of the grower ever receiving a higher price for his cotton sold on net-weight basis as compared with price he would receive on gross weight basis as compared with price he would receive on gross-weight basis.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. That is exactly the point I am trying to bring out at this particular time, as I am afraid many Members are laboring under a misapprehension of the subject.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I believe if all the Members of the House lived in the South where cotton is grown and knew how it is handled, it would not be necessary to speak in behalf of this bill. For many, many years—in fact, so long as I can remember—jute has been used as a wrapper of cotton bales; and the jute industry is the most highly organized of all industries. It has opposed vigorously and aggressively legislation calculated to cause cotton bales to be wrapped in cotton fabric rather than jute.

The cotton farmers for a great many years were fooled because of the fact that the farmers were led to believe that they were paid for this additional weight of jute. They were, therefore, opposed to legislation that would permit them to wrap their cotton in anything but jute, but they have now been disillusioned. In this connection I want to read a letter from the president of the largest agricultural college in the world, which is located in my district, Mr. T. O. Walton, president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, in support of this bill:

Why the farmers of the South have not insisted long ago that the practice of charging 30 pounds tare against each bale of cotton should be discontinued has puzzled me through the years. The only explanation which I can find that is at all satisfactory is that they believe they are getting paid the full amount for the bagging and ties and, since they do not know definitely what happened in the dark, they have not made a great row about this injustice that has been imposed upon them through the years.

Any effort that you may make which will result in stopping

Any effort that you may make which will result in stopping this practice which is unfair to the cotton producer of the entire South will be an effort in the interest of a good cause and one that will make every cotton farmer your debtor. I think the bill should be pressed vigorously and hope that every southern Congressman and Senator will assist you in securing its passage.

The Federal Government is spending large sums to discover new uses for cotton and this bill will help to solve in a practical and simple way, at least in part, this problem. Surely the cotton farmers of the South should be permitted and encouraged to wrap cotton in cotton instead of jute imported from India, and thereby consume annually at least 200,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN].

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of difference of opinion on this legislation. I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley], because I thought he made a clear and fair analysis of this bill. Since many Members are asking for time, I shall be as brief as possible.

Mr. Chairman, my own situation is rather peculiar. Within my district are located three plants engaged in the manufacture of jute bagging. Their pay rolls amount to something less than $700,000 a year, and they employ several hundred people in this work. The net result of this legislation will be to shut down these plants.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Does not the gentleman know that all three of the plants in his district are not engaged solely in the manufacture of jute products but manufacture cotton products also?

Mr. DARDEN. As to that, I can only say that they advise me that such is not the case. I am not personally acquainted with their operations; consequently, I must rely on what they tell me.

Mr. PACE. Is not one of those the Ludlow Manufacturing Co.?

Mr. DARDEN. No; not to my knowledge.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

I yield to the gentleman from Mr. DARDEN. Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman have any idea what it will cost the plants in his district to change over from the manufacture of jute to the manufacture of cotton?

Mr. DARDEN. No, I do not. I could not give the gentleman any accurate figures on that.

Mr. RICH. Their plants and buildings would be satisfactory, of course. It would be just a question of change in machinery, would it not?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; just a question of the machinery.

Mr. RICH. This bill, as I understand it, will allow at least 1 year after the bill is passed so that those changes may be made?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; I think it does so provide.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Do the plants and factories in the gentleman's district manufacture any jute products besides jute bagging that covers cotton bales?

Mr. DARDEN. I do not think so, but I am not sure.

Mr. NICHOLS. If they manufactured anything else besides that particular jute bagging, then they would not have to close because that is the only thing affected by this bill.

Mr. DARDEN. That is true; but I do not think that is the case. I believe their total operations are confined to the manufacture of jute bagging. There used to be a good deal of compressing done down there. There used to be an export market there, but we have lost it to a very great extent.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman understands there are only 12,000,000 of those bags used annually in the United

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; but there are only 12 to 14 plants engaged in that industry in this country. There is a total pay roll involved of approximately $4,000,000 that will be lost.

Mr. RICH. How much of a pay roll is there?

Mr. DARDEN. About $4,000,000 in the country, I understand.

Can the gentleman find out what would be the actual necessary expense of changing over this machinery?

Mr. WALTER. If the gentleman will yield, I can answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Rich]. I have been advised by one of the manufacturers it would not pay them to expend the amount necessary to make the change in their machinery.

Mr. RICH. Why not?

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DARDEN. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FULMER. May I say to the gentleman that I recently received a letter stating that the bagging mill in that particular section would be in position to almost overnight change its machinery so that it could manufacture cotton bagging, and I am also advised that it would cost very little to do this.

Mr. DARDEN. Here is the thing to which we ought to give consideration: It is true that cotton at the present very low price level might be on a competitive basis with burlap. but there is not a Member of the House who does not look forward and hope for a materially better price for cotton because the South cannot exist under the present price that we are receiving for cotton. Should that take place, there is no doubt but what burlap then would have a decided advantage over cotton as a wrapping and would replace it in operations such as this.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 addi-

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, the result would be that we have closed these plants that are now operating in certain sections of the country without having benefited the farmers engaged in the production of cotton.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. It is very evident, is it not, that the price of cotton will not increase materially unless our surplus is worked down, and this is one of the means by which that surplus may be reduced? The gentleman will concede both of those points?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes. We must also give consideration to another point which has been raised this afternoon. The argument has been made in the consideration of this measure that we should close our doors to the foreign products. Cotton depends in the end upon our sales abroad. It would seem unwise to advocate any plan which would tend to interfere with the sale of cotton to other countries.

Mr. SOUTH. That is true, but this bill does not propose to do that.

Mr. DARDEN. No; but the argument has been advanced in defense of this bill that that is what should be done. As a matter of fact, the farmer is not going to receive an extra dollar for his cotton as a result of this legislation. That has been pointed out already by Mr. Cooley.

Mr. COOLEY. Did the gentleman mean to say to the gentleman from Texas that this bill would result in a substantial amount of cotton being used?

Mr. DARDEN. No. I say it will result probably in an additional use for cotton in the immediate future. Once cotton rises in price, I do not think it will be used because it will be supplanted by burlap.

Mr. CLASON. As a matter of fact, this bill does prevent cotton from any other country entering the United States.

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; but I do not think that is a major point, and I do not think the author of the bill would insist on that, although I do not know. As I stated, I do not think that is a major point.

Mr. CLASON. But it backs up the gentleman's statement that if you commence closing our market to the other fellow they will close theirs to us.

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; that is unquestionably true.
Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman points out that if cotton gets too high in price probably burlap could compete with the cotton bagging and would probably be used. Does not the gentleman agree with me that the cotton farmers and cottonproducing sections of the United States could well afford to pay more money for a cotton bagging to wrap a cotton bale in than for the burlap bagging?

Mr. DARDEN. Unquestionably that is true, but the gentleman knows as well as I do that they are not going to pay a premium if they can buy another bagging at a cheaper price. They will purchase the material which serves their purpose at the best possible price.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, it is well known among cotton growers and cotton merchants that the tare evil is most expensive to the cotton growers, and results in very great disadvantage as well to the producers of cotton. It has been suggested that this evil should be remedied by the cotton trade. It might as well be argued that there was no necessity for the regulation of the wheat exchanges and the cotton exchanges as to argue that the cotton trade is going to remedy this evil. It is just as essential to pass legislation to remedy this evil as it was to pass legislation to remedy the evil resulting from the operation of the cotton, corn, and wheat exchanges.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITTINGTON. I prefer completing my statement first. That is not altogether my view. Probably the largest cotton merchant in the world is W. L. Clayton, and he has answered the question. He states, as shown by page 6 of the report of the committee, and I quote:

The cotton trade has been seeking for many years to bring about the necessary reform in the tare evil but has made practically no progress in doing so.

He stated that only legislation could solve the problem, and that the pending bill should accomplish the purpose. Thus says one of the largest cotton merchants of the world.

The Department of Agriculture favors the enactment of this bill. The Cotton Growers Cooperative Association of North Carolina favors the enactment of this bill, as disclosed by the report of the committee. The American Cotton Cooperative Association favors the enactment of this bill. Suppose it does require the readjustment of a few factories and a few thousand workers. It is admitted it will provide for 150,000 to 200,000 bales of cotton. The Congress of the United States has appropriated millions of dollars in an effort to provide new uses for cotton and other agricultural products.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I shall be pleased to yield as soon as I have completed my statement. The gentleman had 15 minutes and I have only 5 minutes.

The pending bill is probably the best avenue immediately available to increase the new uses of cotton. The Department of Agriculture, the cotton associations, the cotton merchants, and the cotton mills say that legislation of this character is essential if this tare evil is to be remedied. I wish to say in this connection that as a cotton grower I know the influences behind the ginners. I know the influences behind the cotton merchants who have asked us to oppose this bill. But first and last, as a cotton grower and as a cotton ginner, I tell you that the jute influences that have been able for all these 90 years to prevent a tariff on jute, and the jute influences, well organized, that have been able to influence the cotton trade and the exchanges in the cotton trade, are undertaking to prevent the passage of this bill. So, in my judgment, even though it does require a readjustment in a few jute factories, we should think of the thousands and tens of thousands of families in the Southland that will be provided for if this legislation is passed.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. WHITTINGTON. I shall be pleased to yield in just a moment.

Under the system that obtains the tare means this: in the domestic market the farmer generally receives credit for 21 pounds tare, around 16 pounds for bagging and 5 pounds for ties. If that cotton is sold on the net weight, as foreign cotton is sold, you can very readily understand that it will provide additional uses of cotton. Now, jute is cheaper than cotton. There is no denying that, but I want to call your attention to the fact that when cotton is cheapest often jute is highest, because if there is one monopoly more strongly entrenched than any other in the United States, it is the jute monopoly. When cotton in 1937 and in 1925 and in 1926 went down because of excessive crops, the price of jute went up, inasmuch as growers could not change bagging during the cotton season in the ginning of the crops. If cotton is sold on a net-weight basis, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in the long run it will provide for a better price to the grower. I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that those who favor the promotion of agriculture and the promotion of cotton and increasing the use of cotton and other agricultural products should support this bill. [Applause.]

Under the leave to extend, I reply briefly to some of the arguments in opposition to the pending bill.

It is said that jute bagging has been used by cotton growers for 90 years and that it should be continued. This argument would retard progress and prevent advancement. Inventions would never be made. The status quo would always be maintained.

It is stated that jute mills provide for domestic labor. The machinery in these mills could be changed, burlap could be manufactured, or the plants might be utilized for the manufacture of cotton. But there is another side to the picture. Exports of cotton are declining. There is less domestic consumption. Workers in the cotton fields of the South are being denied the privilege of working. It would be better to provide for 10,000 workers in the cotton fields rather than 100 workers in the jute factories.

Attention is called to the fact that the Government has 11,000,000 bales of cotton and that it could not be sold in interstate commerce under the provisions of the bill. When pressed, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley], an opponent of the bill, admitted he had overlooked the provisions of the bill. Section 3 provides that only cotton ginned after the effective date of the act cannot be sold in commerce. This objection is captious; it is like other objections to the bill. It falls of its own weight.

It is asserted that there is nothing in the hearings to show that cotton bagging would weigh around 14 ounces per square yard. As stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Fulmer] the hearings disclosed that cotton bagging weighing not to exceed 14 ounces per square yard is substantial. There is a reason, therefore, for limiting the maximum weight of any fabric under section 2 of the bill. At the same time there is no discrimination between cotton and other products. Burlap may be used, but jute will not be used. If the maximum-weight provision of section 2 is eliminated, it would invalidate the bill. Jute would continue to be used. It weighs more and costs less than cotton. The tenant and the grower would be inclined to buy the cheaper fabric to wrap his cotton in, but over a period of years, the use of cotton bagging would be of benefit to the cotton grower.

The method of baling and handling American cotton causes great loss to American cotton growers. The tare evil is a real one. American cotton is the poorest packed commodity in world trade, and hence is at a great disadvantage in competition with the well-packed cotton of foreign countries. The cotton trade might remedy the situation but as disclosed by the hearings, and as I have stated, the cotton trade has made practically no progress in making the necessary reforms. They have made no more progress in reforming the tare evil than they have in reforming the exchanges. It was necessary for Congress to pass legislation to regulate exchanges; it is equally necessary for Congress to pass legislation for net weights in cotton.

The tare evil results from the fact that in domestic commerce the seller is allowed a tare of 21 pounds and in foreign commerce he is allowed a tare of 30 pounds per bale. The use of jute for 90 years is easily explained. Jute is ordinarily cheaper than cotton; at least it was formerly the case. Two-pound bagging sold during the last year at around 11 cents. Ordinary cotton sold at around 8 cents. With the decline in the price of cotton, bagging costs more than cotton. When cotton was 20 cents or 25 cents a pound there was a small profit to the grower by his being allowed a tare of 21 pounds, but when the cotton buyer, the warehouseman, and the exporter get through cutting and sampling the bale of cotton not much wrapping remains, and the cotton becomes easily damaged by dust and other foreign substances. There is an economic loss. There is damage to the grade; the temporary advantage is more than offset by the permanent disadvantage.

Congress has established an experimental ginning laboratory. The appearance of a bale of American cotton when it reaches the average American mill and when it reaches foreign warehouses is a disgrace. The staple is injured and the loss ultimately falls upon the producer.

Not only thoughtful cotton producers, but cotton associations and cotton cooperative associations, including the Texas Cooperative Council, the American Cooperative Association, the North Carolina Cotton Growers, cotton mills, and cotton shippers favor the adoption of the legislation.

The Department of Agriculture reports favorably on the bill and recommends its passage. Net-weight selling would provide an incentive to prevent wasteful practices inherent in the present gross-weight system and would reduce marketing costs.

It is unthinkable that Congress would appropriate millions of dollars to provide laboratories to promote new uses of cotton and other agricultural products and then reject the only sound provision that has been immediately suggested to promote new uses of cotton.

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics reports that approximately 200,000 bales of low-grade cotton would be placed on a competitive basis with jute, burlap, and other materials which might be developed.

The bill does not prevent the using of any bale covering that meets the requirements of the United States tare standards.

The present tare evils and the use of jute bagging increases fire hazards. Fire insurance marine rates are higher because of the disreputable jute bagging. It weighs more.

The transportation of the bale, therefore, costs more. The proposed bill will eliminate waste, reduce insurance and freight charges, and there will be an economic saving of large amounts annually to the producer, the shipper, and the manufacturer.

The Committee on Agriculture has repeatedly reported the bill favorably. It will result in simplification of trade practices; it will eliminate the costs of tares; it will eliminate unfair price competition; it will eliminate much of the controversy between buyer and seller as to weights. There will be the sales advantage of a neater package. The second-hand value of the bagging will probably be five or six times that of jute.

The passage of the bill will promote a good cause; it will ultimately make the cotton growers the debtors of all those who support it. The interests of the cotton growers of the entire South will be promoted.

It will take time to make the necessary adjustments, and it will take time for the ginners and merchants to dispose of their stocks of jute bagging. The bill provides that it shall not become effective until a year after its passage. I will favor any reasonable amendment to postpone the time of the operation of the bill until ginners, merchants, and others dispose of their stocks of bagging. I believe that the passage of the bill will contribute to real and effective practical relief for cotton growers.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Schafer].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a great many Members of this body were greatly surprised to hear the protective tariff speech delivered by our distinguished Democratic colleague who has just left the well of the House. Our colleagues from the cotton-producing States advocate the passage of this bill in order to use a few thousand bales of cotton to replace jute bagging. The benefit to cotton producers will be infinitesimal. If the Members of Congress from the cotton States are desirous of helping our American cotton producers they should join with our Republican Members and stop the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, from opening up the American taxpayers' treasury to the South American dictator countries and giving them handouts of millions of dollars through the Export-Import Bank.

The statistics show that during 6 years of our so-called New Deal our American cotton export market has decreased over 50 percent. During these 6 years the cotton exported by these South American dictatorship countries, which have received New Deal hand-outs of many million dollars from the American taxpayers' Treasury, have greatly increased.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the New Deal administration has adopted the Hull free-trade doctrine of tariff and the friendly neighbor hand-out policy of Morgenthau, I wonder what Mr. Hull will say when he finds the New Deal Members of Congress advocating the passage of the pending bill on protective tariff grounds in direct opposition to the antiprotective tariff position on which the reciprocal-trade agreements are based.

Mr. Chairman, this pending bill, and the speeches made in its behalf, are contrary to the Hull theory of free trade as embodied in the New Deal trade agreements.

I am a protective tariff advocate. I am sick and tired, however, of voting for tariff protection for products raised below the Mason and Dixon line and then listening in and out of Congress to demagogic speeches about the iniquities of protective tariff, by those who asked for high protective tariffs to protect the industries of their States.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Whittington] and other proponents of this bill have made some fine protective-tariff speeches in its behalf. I sincerely hope that they will continue to support the principle of protective tariff and join with the minority to repeal the Hull reciprocal free-trade agreements, which are inimical to the interests of the agricultural and industrial producers of America. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Poage].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I have felt we ought to give just a little more consideration to the answer to the question that somebody raised here a little while ago that if the farmer is not actually getting payment in the price of his cotton for the tare under the present system, why do we continue the policy of wrapping cotton in this sort of stuff in the South? The reason, I think, is very evident.

For many years the farmer of the South has supposed he was being paid at the same price for this jute that he was being paid for his cotton, but when one stops and analyzes that he is bound to realize that the man who buys that bale of cotton, whether he be in Liverpool or whether it be an American mill, is only buying cotton. The American miller or the English miller is only interested in buying cotton and is not going to pay 8 cents a pound for this jute stuff. So when a bale of cotton reaches the mill, if the mill pays $40, the farmer considers that he has received $40 for a 500-pound bale of cotton, but that bale of cotton has 30 pounds of bagging and ties on it. The mill gives $40 for the bale and that figures 8 cents a pound for a 500-pound bale, but the mill did not give 8 cents a pound for this jute bagging you see here. It had no use for that at any price. The mill gave 8.33 1/3 cents for 470 pounds of cotton. That is what the mill paid for and that is the basis on which every manufacturer buys cotton. That is the basis on which payment is made—at 8.33 cents per pound for 470 pounds of cotton, with nothing in the world for this other stuff. The farmer thought he was getting paid for 500 pounds at 8 cents. He actually got paid 8.33 cents for 470 pounds of cotton, and that is all that he got. Now, who makes a profit, then, other than the jute interests? The original weight of the bale included only 21 pounds of tare, but when that cotton was sold on the Dallas Cotton Exchange the rules of that exchange allowed 22 pounds of tare-a profit of a few cents to a cotton buyer. When it was sold on the New York Exchange the rules of that Exchange allowed 25 pounds of tare—an additional profit to some trader—and when it was exported the export rules allowed 30 pounds of tare-and some cotton exporter made half a dollar per bale, but the farmer did not make any profit on any of that.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is it not a fact that the ginner who originally purchased the cotton and paid for the first 21 pounds of tare, makes up his loss by adding it to the price that he charges the farmer for ginning the cotton?

Mr. POAGE. Absolutely; the farmer pays for the whole thing.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. Is it not absolutely ridiculous to say that the farmer gets paid for the jute? If that were the custom which it is not, it could and would readily be changed. Does the gentleman know of anyone who would have the audacity to try to make that kind of argument stand up here except this monopoly which is selling jute in this country?

Mr. POAGE. I cannot conceive of anybody who would undertake to argue it except those interested in selling this stuff—jute.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POAGE. Yes.

Mr. COOLEY. I suppose the gentleman heard my statement to the effect that I had no objection to a net-weight bill.

Mr. POAGE. That is correct.

Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman has spent a great deal of time talking about the net-weight features of the bill. I ask the gentleman if he is not more interested in eliminating the use of certain bags, and regulating the type generally than he is in the net-weight features of the bill?

Mr. POAGE. I say to the gentleman frankly that I am more interested in the use of cotton than I am in the netweight features of the bill, because, as I calculate it there can be a saving made to the southern cotton farmer of about 33 points on his pound of cotton by reason of the net weight. but by reason of the use of approximately 200,000 bales of cotton, and that is what the Bureau Agriculture Economics suggests would be added to our cotton consumption by using cotton bagging, we will probably increase the value of the entire cotton crop by about half a cent on each pound of cotton, so that you will have a profit by reason of increasing the value of the entire cotton crop by about $30,000,000 per year or nearly twice as much increase as we have reason to expect as a result of the net-weight trading. Therefore while I am interested in the net weight, I am interested in it to the extent of probably $15,000,000, but I am interested in the increase in the price of cotton by the use of 200,000 additional bales of cotton to the extent of some $30,000,000 per year and therefore, I confess, I am more interested in the matter of that profit than in the net-weight features of the bill.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FULMER. The surplus freight paid on this heavy bagging amounts to $6,000,000 a year.

Mr. POAGE. That is correct, but the unfortunate thing about the whole matter is that the farmer cannot see the losses that he continues to sustain for the benefit—they are so indirect and so well concealed that, like the tariff, they pass unnoticed, and by the same token it is going to be hard for the average farmer to see the tangible benefit of this bill after it is passed—especially with the propaganda of the jute people trying to mislead him.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I am a wheat farmer from the Pacific Northwest, and I am in favor of this bill because I believe it is a move in the right direction, using American cotton to replace foreign jute. If Europe insists upon committing suicide on the field of battle, it may be in the near future that more and more we will have to legislate in this hall for protection of the American farmer, by giving him exclusive right to the American markets. More thoroughly than ever am I convinced that the American market is not only for the American industrialist, but is also for the American farmer. In the Pacific Northwest we sack millions of bushels of wheat and barley in this jute. I am not interested in the raisers of jute. They buy no cotton, they buy no wheat. There is no reciprocal trade with those people who produce jute. Why should this market be given over to them when we can use home-grown cotton?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. RICH. So far as dealing with foreign countries is concerned, does the gentleman not believe that the price has more to do with selling to foreign buyers than any particular trade agreement or matter of friendship that may exist. When people buy things today they buy quality for the least price that they have to pay for it.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. There is no doubt about that, but my interest in this bill arises from the fact that it creates a market for an American farm product, and everything that may be said for jute should be swept aside when we learn that here is a market for 200,000 bales of cotton.

That is the argument.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Pace].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very grateful for your close attention. It may be possible for me to help you better understand the pending bill. I have planted cotton, I have plowed cotton, I have picked cotton. I have worked in the gin, I have worked in the compress, and I live among people whose hope is in cotton. I wish you knew the condition of the cotton farmer of the South. I wish you knew how earnestly we want to help him. You have missed the mark on this bill for some reason.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PACE. Not now. There are only two reasons why this bill should be enacted.

Let me say before I mention those reasons, that this bill does not prohibit the use of jute bagging.

Mr. COOLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. PACE. Of course.

Mr. COOLEY. Why would it not be a good idea to write a provision in here, which I will support, which will require the wrapping of every American bale of cotton in cotton wrapping? Will the gentleman support that sort of an amendment?

Mr. PACE. Of course I would, but such a provision would in my opinion be unconstitutional.

The bill does not prohibit the use of jute bagging, and I say to you sincerely that it will not necessarily cause the loss of employment of a single employee of a jute plant. If those people wanted to do so, they could make this jute bagging of lighter weight right now. They do not do so, it appears, because they want the farmer to believe he is being paid for this heavy bagging.

There are two reasons that justify the passage of this bill. One is to reduce the weight of a bale of cotton and thereby save freight charges. Unfortunately the cotton producer has not anything to do with the price he receives for his cotton. Cotton is a world commodity, as you know, and the man who buys cotton pays not what the producer should receive, but he pays according to what he can receive for his finished product. Therefore, if he must pay freight on an extra 5 or 10 pounds, he naturally must figure that into the cost he pays for the good lint cotton that he buys.

The other reason that justifies this bill is one that has not been mentioned at all. That is, that this jute, through the weeks and months that it is moved about, comes loose on a bale of cotton. Many, many, many times have I seen a bale of cotton covered with this jute fiber off of the bagging.

I wrote probably the biggest user of cotton in the United States. I said:

When you buy cotton now, the farmer thinks you are paying him for that jute bagging. I want you to write me and tell me whether or not you do.

I want you to listen to his reply:

We buy raw lint cotton, figuring on obtaining therefrom a certain percentage of clean cotton. In calculating this percentage of clean cotton, we treat the bagging and ties just as we treat the leaf, dirt, and short fibers that we take out in our cleaning machinery. Depending on the class of goods that we make, we figure on obtaining from 75 to 90 pounds of finished goods from every 100 pounds of raw cotton, just as it comes to us in the bale. As a consequence, to obtain the price of clean cotton in figuring on our selling price, we divide the price of raw cotton by a figure from 75 to 90. This divisor takes care of the loss in the bagging and ties. If we had a lower percentage of bagging and ties, we, of course, would get a higher percentage of clean cotton and the raw cotton would be more valuable to us, so, in the long run, the farmer pays for the heavier jute bagging.

That is from one of the biggest buyers of cotton in the entire United States. What they do when they receive a bale of cotton is this: They have combs and they go over it and strip it. Every single particle in the bale that has this little piece of jute in it has to be stripped away, and when they have finished stripping a bale of cotton there is from 25 to 100 pounds of waste on the floor. Now, you gentleman are good businessmen. You have common sense enough to know that that is all deducted from the price they pay the farmer for his cotton.

We are simply asking here that the sale of cotton be on a net-weight basis, and we are hoping—and that is all it is, a hope—that we can go to the farmer and convince him that he is not being paid anything for that heavy jute. The Jute Trust representative comes by and tells him that he is, but we can say, "You are not being paid anything for that. If you use this light cotton bagging made from your own cotton it will do two things. It will not only increase the use of your own commodity, but it will give you a price for from 25 to 50 pounds additional lint in the bale." If this cotton bagging should ravel, in fact, it does not to any consequence but if it should ravel a little and mix with the lint cotton, no damage has been done; no combing is necessary.

I think we should be fair with all interests as we go along. There are many people in this country, ginners, warehousemen, and jute manufacturers who have a supply of jute bagging on hand. I think they should be taken care of. This bill provides now that the new standards shall not go into effect until 12 months from the time the bill is approved. I do not believe that is long enough. I propose to offer an amendment making the effective date of this act January 1, 1941. Then there will be 12 months after that before the order setting up the new standards will be enforced, or about $2\frac{1}{2}$ years before this law, if enacted, would be in operation. Within that time there is not a jute plant—the one in my district, the one in your district—that will not be able to adjust its business to the point where they can begin manufacturing cotton bagging out of an American commodity just as today they are manufacturing jute bagging out of a commodity produced yonder in far away India. If we give them this much time I believe we are treating them fairly. I believe there is not a cotton farmer in the South who does not want to be fair; but I know they are begging, I know they are appealing for the cooperation of the Congress that they may compete in the world market.

In conclusion let me read to you from a confidential report made of an investigation of the foreign mills. I cannot read it all because it is confidential, but I do read a portion of it. This is with reference to an investigation made in England.

The cheap and unkempt condition and appearance of American cotton bales is a standing indictment of the American method. Egyptian, Indian, Brazilian, Peruvian, East and West African, Belgian Congo, and most other foreign bales present a pronounced contrast in appearance when compared with American bales. These foreign bales are completely covered with a first-class quality lightweight bagging.

This, gentlemen, is the only nation that at this hour is still in the hands of one of the most powerful lobbies on earth, the Jute Trust.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. COOLEY. Is the gentleman in position to tell us whether or not foreign cotton is packed in cotton bagging or burlap bagging?

Mr. PACE. I am inclined to the belief that it is sampled at the gin—which we should do. Then it is wrapped in burlap or cotton bagging and is never touched until it is opened on the floor of the mill.

Mr. COOLEY. That is right; and the pictures exhibited to this House present the American bale of cotton after it has been cut all to pieces by the cotton buyer, whereas the foreign bale of cotton is never touched. Is not that true?

Mr. PACE. Yes; and I hope the gentleman will support a companion bill to this which would require the sampling of cotton to be done at the gin so that the bale covering need not be cut and so that we can really compete with foreign producers. Mr. Chairman, the competition from Brazil has gotten serious. American money has gone to Brazil to produce cotton. They have high-pressure gins and modern methods down there. Very soon, unless we get some help, we will be compelled to turn to raising cattle, to the dairy business, and to other crops now produced in other sections of the country. The cotton farmer cannot long continue to produce cotton and sell it for less than the cost of production.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. Answering the gentleman from North Carolina, I may state that is one of the reasons we have strong opposition to this bill; because when we get net weight naturally this will lead to high-density gin compression thereby sacrificing additional millions.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman seems to be predicating his statement on the ground of competition we are going to have from Brazil and other countries.

Mr. PACE. Not going to have, that we are already suf-

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Then is the gentleman's position the same on other products, especially manufactured products? In other words is he opposed to the tremendous influx of foreign manufactured goods?

Mr. PACE. I have repeatedly made the statement on this floor and in my district that I for one believe that the American farmer is entitled to the American market; and I want him to have it. [Applause.]

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. The gentleman is speaking of the American farmer. I am heartily in accord with the gentleman insofar as the American farmer is concerned, but what about the American manufacturer?

Mr. PACE. It is my understanding that the American manufacturer is pretty well protected at this time.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is he protected under the reciprocal-trade agreements against the competition of European manufactured goods made by cheap labor, goods which are flooding our markets? Are not the American manufacturers entitled to the American market?

Mr. PACE. I appreciate the gentleman's viewpoint.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. What is the gentleman's viewpoint about that?

Mr. PACE. That is a very big subject, the reciprocal-trade policy, to discuss in such a short time. Suppose we do that later. I may add that I wish to protect the American laborer as well as the American farmer.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. I am in entire accord with the gentleman's argument, but I am astonished that the gentleman would stand on the floor of the House and say in effect that he is opposed to the importation into this country of anything that can be manufactured or produced here, for the gentleman must know that the minute America adopts that policy her export market will be stopped. The gentleman knows further that practically that very thing did happen a few years ago. The only way we can find a market for our surplus commodities is to buy some of the surplus commodities of other countries.

Mr. PACE. I regret that the gentleman and I are not in full accord. But as long as the manufacturer is protected, and the farmer is made to bear the burden of that protection, then I think the farmer should be given equal protection on his products. We should all be treated the same.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly, but if I did I would like to be satisfied as to the accuracy of the statement. Did I understand the gentleman to say that, due to combing, a bale of cotton loses 100 pounds?

Mr. PACE. The total loss sometimes runs as high as 100

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I think that is not quite accurate, for 100 pounds is a great deal to lose out of a

Mr. PACE. What I intended to say was that the entire tare against the bale of cotton, that includes the bagging, ties, and combings-that the entire tare against the bale of cotton has frequently, and does frequently, range from 50 to

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman says "frequently." I am asking the gentleman what it is, on the average. I am not from the South, and am not intimately acquainted with the details of the cotton business, but I do have some knowledge of it. When the gentleman asks me to believe a bale cotton weighing 500 pounds has an average tare of 25 to 30 pounds to begin with, then loses 100 pounds in combing, I do not think that is true.

Mr. PACE. I do not want the gentleman to think so.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I know differently. Mr. PACE. I should probably have been more precise and said that frequently the entire tare on a bale of cotton will range from 50 to 100 pounds.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. That is different.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. PACE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. RICH. I am quite surprised at the gentleman and his answer to the question asked by the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman asked whether you are for the protection of the American farmer, and you admitted you

Mr. PACE. That does not require an admission.

Mr. RICH. I am for the protection of the American farmer, the American laborer, and the American manufacturer. I think every red-blooded American ought to be in favor of all the people of America regardless of what their vocation might be.

Mr. PACE. I appreciate the gentleman's enthusiasm. I do not know what the future holds in store for us. We maintain the highest standard of living in the world. We are all proud of it and want to keep it that. It has not been so difficult in the past, because we had large undeveloped areas and enormous natural resources. But now most of our territory is settled and our resources are being rapidly exhausted. It was suggested here a few moments ago that we must buy cheaply produced and cheaply made products from the rest of the world so that they will buy our expensively produced and expensively made products. How long can we do that? How long can we admit and compete with cheap foreign labor and maintain our high standard of living?

Sooner than we now think we may be faced with the issue of either closing our ports to foreign goods or substantially reducing our cost of production. Some claim we may be saved that decision because, they say, Americans are the most efficient people on earth, and through mass production, our unit cost can be kept low. But already Japan and Germany are approaching if not matching our efficiency, and at this hour there are hundreds of American experts in the employ of foreign countries, in Russia, in France, in Brazil, in Chile, in Argentina, and elsewhere, teaching their people mass production and efficiency. In addition there are millions and millions of American dollars, backed by American genius and American efficiency, being invested in those foreign countries, to manufacture goods and produce crops and develop resources for competition with American goods and crops. Millions of American money is in Brazil today producing cotton in competition with the South.

I am no isolationist, but as I look into the future I seem tc see a road that will not ride as smooth for us as we have traveled the last 150 years. With a small population, vast territory and enormous resources, we have wasted our substance and enjoyed a land of plenty with little thought of the future. But sooner or later, and soon I fear, we will come to a fork in the road and the selection of the better way is going to require all of the intelligence and patriotism of that great Nation.

This Nation was once referred to as half slave and half free, and it was claimed that a nation so divided could not stand. That situation was changed so far as personal freedom was concerned. But today the economic condition of the greater part of our farming population is as bad as slavery, or worse. They live in want and must compete with cheap, forced labor in foreign lands, while another portion of our people live in the economic security of a protective tariff wall. Can a nation prosper when so divided? Is not the southern cotton farmer entitled to the same protection against the cheap labor in the jute fields of India as is the eastern shoe manufacturer against the low wages of Europe?

For my part, I shall never ask for more than equal treatment; for my part, I shall never be satisfied with less.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Doxey].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that to close this debate with only 5 minutes remaining for debate one can only touch the high spots, so to speak. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that we will never see cotton sold on a net-weight basis, nor will we ever see cotton wrapped in anything but this jute bagging unless the Congress legislates regarding it. Why? Because you know as well as I do that the trade practice and the jute interests are so strong that ever since cotton has been a commodity it has been wrapped in jute. Some of you Members of Congress do not remember possibly the old hand-power gin or the gin that was drawn with a mule, but they ginned cotton in those days and they used the same wrapping and packing that they do todaythis foreign product, jute, from India. With all the serious handicaps that cotton is laboring under today, we should be in favor of putting cotton in the best package and in the most salable manner possible in order to better sell our cotton abroad and use cotton wherever possible and reduce the great surplus we have on hand, even if it costs a little extra money or some inconvenience to the jute interests, because we have to sell this cotton at home and abroad; we have to get rid of the surplus, and that is one of the purposes of this bill. I wish I had time to discuss the bill section by section. For years the House Committee on Agriculture has given a lot of thought and time to this

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is twofold: First, it is to get the bale wrapped in a package that will sell, compete, and compare with every other bale of cotton of any foreign country. In other words, to standardize the covering for baled cotton. We have the best product in the world so far as the cotton itself is concerned, but we have the worst-looking package in the world and the most uneconomic package which enters into world commerce from any country, thereby making the domestic and marine insurance against our American cotton practically twice as high as similar rates applied to Egyptian or Indian cotton bales. The second purpose of this bill is to provide for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign commerce transactions in cotton.

I have been a member of the Agriculture Committee of the House for 10 years, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Fulmer] has introduced this bill in every session of Congress to my own personal knowledge for the last 10 years. We would bring it out of the House Agriculture Committee, but we could not get a rule to bring it to the floor of the House for a vote. We could not get it up here on the floor of the House for consideration and if we did get it up for consideration, it was filibustered to death. That is the record of this net-weight cotton bill for the last 10 years in this House.

Mr. Chairman, from the discussion had on the floor today, there are only two classes of people who can be legitimately against this bill, and they of course have that right. One is the class of people who may be interested in the jute interests and the other is the class of people who think the farmer will not be benefited by this legislation. Some of my colleagues from the South have stated to me that they have received telegrams from cotton ginners and other people and organizations stating that the farmer will lose through this legislation.

We all know this is a selfish world. The ginners buy their bagging and ties from the wholesaler and of course he buys them from the jute manufacturer, and of course there is a middleman who also must make his commission. The ginner places his order in the spring to sell to the farmer in the fall when he gins his cotton. That ginner naturally is going to make a profit on his bagging and ties and he includes it in the ginning of his cotton. The farmer pays anywhere from $3 to $5 a bale for ginning his cotton. However, the farmers are waking up to the situation now. When the farmer is given 81/4 cents for his cotton, he thinks he is also getting one-fourth cent for the bagging and ties. He has been made to think that all along. Why? Because of the activity in this regard on the part of the people who are interested in the jute industry.

I do not deny that they have their factories geared up to manufacture jute, but I say that all the jute factories, as you may think from the speeches of some of the gentlemen here today, are not in the East. There are a number of them in the South. No one wants to put people out of work, but if we can use 200,000 bales of cotton, which will be taken out of this surplus on hand, by using a cotton wrapping instead of this foreign jute, it will be a distinct advantage to American-grown cotton and therefore benefit the cotton farmer. We all know how strong the jute industry is. I was here when the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was enacted into law and the jute people were so strong that even the Republicans who were then in power would not put a tariff on jute. It comes in here free of duty, competing with our own cotton. I wish I had time to reply to the speech made by the gentleman from Wisconsin when he talked about private interests and American-made goods for American people. You know, lip service is easy, but when you come to doing the right thing through your votes here this afternoon, you should vote for this bill regardless on what side of the aisle you are. This bill is not only constructive, it is not only in the interest of the cotton farmer, but it is in the interest of the unemployed. The cotton people of the South do not want to take unnecessarily any benefit from anyone, but if we can use 200,000 bales of cotton to wrap our own cotton with each year, that means that forty or fifty thousand people who are engaged in the production of cotton in the South will be given a livelihood. It means the first step in the right direction, inasmuch as we have been talking about finding new uses for cotton. No one on either side of the aisle will deny that we should find more uses for cotton. However, this is the first piece of legislation you have had an opportunity to vote on that specifically provides for new and additional uses for cotton. I say this bill should pass and I hope it will not be filibustered under the 5-minute rule. Watch and be on your guard, friends of the cotton South. Anything can happen. We have worked a long time to get a vote on this cotton netweight bill, and I trust we can pass it here this afternoon. It has been a long, hard fight. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I intended to offer the following amendment:

On page 3, line 5, strike out "1 year" and insert "18 months."

However, I understand the gentleman from Georgia intends to offer that amendment, so I shall not do so.

I wish to say I am a woolen manufacturer. When we buy wool we buy it net, we do not buy tare. I cannot conceive of an American cotton manufacturer buying cotton and adding the tare to it and paying full price for the tare as well as cotton. He buys the cotton net.

The question we are confronted here with today is just this: Are we Americans for America or for some foreign country? I am not in sympathy with American manufacturers or American businessmen who take their money and go to some foreign country and try to develop a business and send their products back here and then expect us to think they ought to regulate and make the laws so that they will receive the benefit and that our American people will not be taken care of but that the American people will support them and their business. I am for an American tariff from Maine to California and from Michigan to Louisiana that protects all our people. I can see no way in which we can help the American people more than by trying to take care of the cotton farmer at this time as well as all farmers-beet and cane sugar, wheat, oats, and hay. Let me say here that we have had the most cockeyed legislation in regard to the cotton farmer in the last 4 or 5 years that I have ever seen in all my life. You can thank the New Deal and the Bankhead Cotton Act for wrecking the southern cotton farmer. It is responsible for that and do not let anyone tell you different.

You have lost our cotton markets in foreign countries and you will never get them back, so there is only one thing for us to do; that is, settle down and try to use our wits and our brains and business ability in attempting to help solve the cotton problem. If we do not help the cotton farmer, he is going to wreck our northern farmers, because he will produce the same crops our northern farmers grow.

Now, what do we have to do? I say to you that if we give 18 months to the American manufacturer to get his plants in shape so he will not lose any but the least amount of money in changing over his plant, he ought to be very thankful that he can start in then to use American cotton to put on bales of American cotton so our American cotton bale will look just as good as a foreign bale. An American bale of cotton is certainly a horrible thing to look at now, and no manufacturer wants to look at it very long. Nothing attractive or inviting about it.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. In connection with the statement the gentleman made a few moments ago with respect to American businessmen setting up plants in foreign countries. I may say that Ludlow in a city in India has a number of manufacturing plants that are flooding this country. He has prevented the Republican Party from putting a tariff on this commodity, and the Democrats could not get anywhere with it if they wanted to.

Mr. RICH. Here is a Republican that is not going to support Ludlow [applause], because I am here to help the American farmer and I want to protect by tariff all commodities.

I want to go further than you from the South. When you say you are willing to help the southern cotton farmer, have you enough red blood to say, "I am going to help American labor; I am going to help American manufacturers"? We have to work together, whether we live in the South or in the North. I do not want to hear any more of this bulldosing or bully ragging for something that is "good for my district" when it is not going to help somebody else. As long as I have been in Congress I have followed the principle that I want to help America. [Applause.] You will not do anything that will help the South or any other section and you will not maintain the standard of living in America and keep American wages high unless you give us a tariff that will protect us from the effect of the low wages paid in foreign countries. If we do not do that, we will have all our business done in foreign countries. The 130,000,000 people in this country create a market as good as the 500,000,000 people in Europe. I say we ought to enact this law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am in the same position as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley]. No cotton farmer in my district has asked me to vote for this bill. [Laughter.] I admit the reason is I have no cotton farmer in my district; but the outstanding bagging manufacturers of the United States are located in my city, and they and hundreds of their employees have asked me to vote against this bill.

I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Doxev] that it is true this bill has been around here for 10 years. It is also true that I am one of those responsible for the bill being defeated for the last 10 years.

When you find representatives of the cotton growers unable today to agree upon a piece of legislation, something is radically wrong with that legislation. That is your situation here today.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. COCHRAN. In just a moment.

We are hearing a great deal these days about disturbing business. "Leave business alone." We are getting that phrase from our Republican brothers. They are proclaiming daily, "Leave business alone." I am asking you now to let business alone; leave a great industry alone, a great industry that was established nearly 100 years ago for the purpose of manufacturing the covering for your cotton. There are thousands and thousands of employees in this country who will be out of employment if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. In just a minute.

There are thousands who will be affected in my city. This is no time to add to the unemployment rolls or destroy an industry that has existed for nearly a hundred years.

Manufacturers have spent large sums for machines to make the covering for the cotton, and here you would make them worthless overnight and put the operators of the machines out of a job.

So I say to you, let us follow the suggestions we have heard recently and let business alone, let this great industry that has been manufacturing this covering alone, by defeating this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that my friend from Missouri makes the statement that this bill has been defeated for a period of some 10 or more years, and that he is responsible for it. I want to say to him that, in my judgment, he has nothing to be proud of.

The cotton farmers, Mr. Chairman, are the poorest paid and, perhaps, the poorest organized, of any group in America. They have not had their spokesmen to come before Congress and plead their cause as the jute people have had, and as they now have. This is the reason we find them in their present plight.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cochran] states that by the enactment of this law you are going to create unemployment. Why? Because you are going to throw some of the processors of jute out of the work they are now doing, but I would remind the gentleman that if this bill is enacted, not only will a like number of men be required to process the cotton, but American labor will plant, cultivate, harvest, and process the cotton, and therefore for every man that you throw out of employment in the jute industry, you will employ 10 American men in the cotton industry. If the gentleman from Missouri does not agree to this statement, I would like for him to rise and explain his position now.

I wish to say to you again that every time an attempt has been made here to do something that will really help the cotton farmer, if it is going to harm the jute manufacturers, as you have seen time and again, there is always some man ready to defend the latter. Why? Not because he loves the cotton farmer, and not because he is interested in unemployment in this country. One does not have to be very intelligent to know that this legislation will help the farmer.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOUTH. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I do not believe the American manufacturer would hurt the cotton farmer near as much as the men who have legislated in the past 6 years with respect to cotton itself, because when you try to raise the price of cotton so high that all the foreign countries cannot afford to buy, you kill it yourself.

Mr. SOUTH. I am not so sure about that. I want to repeat, the cotton farmer is not organized and is not able to present his views here, except through his representatives. The cotton farmer is not going to be fooled any longer by this kind of talk. I say to you gentlemen that it is an insult to the intelligence of this House for gentlemen to come on the floor and attempt to tell you that any intelligent, legitimate manufacturing concern would pay for this jute. What would they do with it? If that is the practice now, it would be a very simple matter to change it. Who is putting out that talk? The jute monopoly is talking through certain men who have spoken on this bill.

Now, let us get down to some common sense about this matter. What are we trying to do? We are trying to remove a part of the enormous surplus that now exists in the form of baled cotton in this country. And how do we propose to do it? We propose to do it by substituting the use of cotton for jute, a product that is grown abroad and shipped into this country. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Missouri boasts of the fact that for 10 or 15 years he has been instrumental in defeating this legislation. What has he accomplished? He has helped a few jute manufacturing concerns, he has helped to impoverish the cotton farmer of this country, and he has added several thousand to the unemployed in the cotton-growing and cotton-manufacturing sections of this Nation.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want it distinctly understood that my opposition to this bill is not based upon, nor is it accelerated by any love which I may have for the manufacturers of jute. My opposition is based, as I said before, upon the fact that I am not convinced that it will help the cotton farmer. The statement has been made here that the farmer is not paid for bagging and ties. I am willing to concede that statement is correct.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOLEY. Not now. At the same time, if he is not paid for the bagging and ties, for more than 100 years he has been under that impression, however erroneous it may have been. If the farmer is not paid for the bagging and ties, everyone knows that when his cotton is ginned the farmer buys and pays for the bagging and ties. Everyone knows that cotton bagging is more expensive than jute or burlap bagging. If the cotton farmer buys and pays for the bagging he uses, regardless of its character or kind, and he sells his cotton and is not paid in return for the bagging, then we are visiting by this measure an additional burden upon the cotton farmer. I would like for someone to rise in his place and tell me just where this bill and just how this bill will increase the price of cotton.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. FULMER. If the gentleman will write to any one of these 20 or 30 cotton mills and any one of them says that they will not pay the difference in the net weight, then I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. COOLEY. What difference?
Mr. FULMER. The difference because of the weight now deducted, because of not using cotton bagging. The cotton mills are doing it now.

Mr. COOLEY. They are doing what?

Mr. FULMER. They are paying the entire price. If cotton is 10 cents for the gross weight, they will pay 101/2 cents for the net weight.

Mr. COOLEY. But the farmer does not get the increase in the price of cotton because, upon the sale of it, you are going to deduct the weight of the bagging and ties.

Mr. FULMER. In addition, he will not have to pay the excess freight of six million because of the surplus weight. and the insurance will be higher.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes. Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman will concede that we have an enormous surplus of cotton in this country.

Mr. COOLEY. That is correct. Mr. SOUTH. And he will concede that by the use of cotton to wrap cotton it would tend to reduce that surplus.

Mr. COOLEY. I concede that, and if that is what we have in mind, why not write into this bill in definite and unambiguous language a provision which requires that every bale of American cotton shall be wrapped in cotton bagging. Will the gentleman support that sort of a bill?

Mr. SOUTH. So far as I know now I would.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. On the other hand, this bill starts out to be a net-weight bill, and if you look at the title you will see just what it actually is:

To provide for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign transactions in cotton, to provide for the standardization of bales for cotton, and for other purposes.

The last portion is the part that I object to. I do not object to the net-weight proposition. I will welcome an opportunity to vote for a law requiring that cotton be wrapped in cotton, but what I do object to is putting one industry out of business which is engaged in manufacturing an imported article, to give that business to burlap manufacturers, which is likewise an imported article. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman is one of the most distinguished and able men in this House, and will he stand in his place and say that a bill requiring the wrapping of cotton in cotton would be constitutional?

Mr. COOLEY. May I say to the gentleman that I would not state that in my opinion it would be constitutional. I am not giving my opinion about it, but I submit this observation. If we have a right to pass a law providing that a farmer in America shall not sell cotton in bagging that weighs more than 14 ounces, then under God's heaven we ought to be able to go all the way through and say that he would have to use a particular kind of wrapping.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in order to provide for the more adequate covering and protection of the American cotton bale and to facilitate net-weight trading in cotton, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to investigate the handling, inspection, and transporta tion of cotton in interstate and foreign commerce; to study the materials used for bale covering; and from time to time to establish standards for materials to be used for bale covering, which such standards shall include specifications and tolerance as to sizes, weights, constructions, strength, and any other factors of quality that he may find to be necessary; said standards, when established, to be known as the "United States Official Cotton Tare Standards": Provided, That the official cotton tare standards first established hereunder shall be promulgated within 1 year from the date of the approval of this act: Provided further, That any such standards or change or replacement thereof shall become effective only on and after a date specified in the order of the Secretary of Agriculture establishing the same, which date shall be not less than 1 year from the date of such order, but pending such effective date of new or revised standards any bale covering material conforming with such new or revised standards may be used in lieu of any bale covering material embraced in the United States Official Cotton Tare Standards theretofore promulgated. The maximum weight of any fabric standardized under this section as bagging for the covering of cotton bales shall not exceed 14 ounces per square yard, and the maximum weight of any fabric standardized for patches shall not exceed 20 ounces per patch; and no such fabrics standardized for bagging or patches shall be composed of any material previously used for covering cotton belos unless the same shall be to previously used for covering cotton bales unless the same shall have been reprocessed and rewoven.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a unanimous-consent request before the amendment is read. This amendment involves the matter of time. It requires an amendment to this section and the adding of a section at the end of the bill. They are together. I ask unanimous consent they be considered in the one amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. Pace: On page 3, in line 5, strike out the words "of the approval of this act" and insert the words "this act becomes effective"; and at the end of section 10 add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 11. This act shall become effective January 1, 1941."

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the amendments, the first provision of this section now under consideration, page 3, line 5-

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept that amendment.

Mr. PACE. I thank the gentleman for the acceptance of the amendment.

I might explain that the bill now provides that the standards shall be effective 1 year from the date of the approval of the act. I change that to make them effective 1 year after the act becomes effective, and then provide that the act shall become effective on January 1, 1941. Then the order will go into effect 1 year from that time, putting the standards in force on January 1, 1942, by which time those who have supplies on hand will be able to dispose of them and plants will be able to adjust their machinery and their business in accordance with the new standards. I believe this will be fair to all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Clason: On page 3, line 15, after the period in line 15, strike out the remainder of section 2.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all time on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. CLASON. Well, I object to that, Mr. Chairman. I do not know how many want to speak on it. I think it is an important amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is because at the present time, covering for cotton weighs, as I am told, 134 pounds to 2 pounds per yard. This speaks of 14 ounces per square yard. I know of no evidence that has been introduced at any hearing or on the floor this afternoon which indicates that cotton satisfactory for the bales of cotton can be produced at 14 ounces to the square yard. In fact, the information which I have has been that it would weigh more than that.

The other proposition is this: The purpose of this bill is to allow certain Government agencies to establish fair standards and regulations. Along comes this bill and they put in a sentence which eliminates the right of these people to determine what we are to have in the way of covering for cotton. I presume they are making something down at the Lane Co.'s mill in New Orleans which comes somewhere near these figures, and therefore they hope to restrict the whole market to that one mill.

There is nothing in this bill that indicates that when the bill is passed jute products in some form will not be that which is used to cover cotton. I think what we want to have is a kind of fabric which will weigh enough to do the work and do it properly. Certainly no one believes that half the cotton is going to do the work of the jute which they have been using for the last 100 years. I feel that in fairness this part should be stricken out. If the purpose of this is to have cotton cover cotton. I would like to have you read, on page 24 of the hearings before the Senate, where the man in the Senate who is supposed to know more about cotton than any other Senator, Senator "Cotton" Ep Smith, speaks on this subject:

Dr. Murchison. What I really think about it, Senator, is that we should use cotton for the bale covering, which would use up a tremendous amount of cotton.

Senator SMITH. I do not doubt that, but in selling cotton that Senator SMTH. I do not doubt that, but in selling cotton that has never appealed to me. Now, we want to get down to the bottom of this thing. Suppose that they were selling silk from India, and it came covered with silk. The tare would be on silk. I think that the buyers would be inclined to think that the silk business must be mighty cheap over there if they can use silk to cover it with. That is a hell of a note. Go on. You would discount your courter. count your cotton.

That comes from the outstanding authority, in the minds of the public at least, in the Congress of the United States, Senator SMITH.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield. Mr. COOLEY. The gentleman's amendment proposes to strike out the standards which have been set up in the bill? Mr. CLASON. Yes.

Mr. COOLEY. This would preclude the use of any bagging in excess of 14 ounces per yard.

Mr. CLASON. That is right.
Mr. COOLEY. Then it would leave it up to the Department to make some determination with regard to the proper weight of bagging.

Mr. CLASON. Exactly; and that is my purpose, because I feel that these people might well say that it ought to be a pound and a half, or that it might be any number of ounces; and for this Congress to vote on this bill with any weight specified for the covering seems to me to be absolutely

Mr. COOLEY. During the entire debate no one advocating the bill has given the House any information in regard to the necessary weight or the proper weight for either burlap. or cotton, or jute bagging. Is not that true?

Mr. CLASON. That is a fact; and, further, at the present time the covering weighs from 28 ounces to 32 ounces; and for them to level it down to 14 ounces with not a word in front of us to indicate why, looks as though there is something in the wood pile.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLASON. I yield. Mr. SOUTH. It is pretty evident from the sample coverings on the table in the Well of the House that cotton would be considerably lighter than jute, is it not?

Mr. CLASON. I think cotton would be lighter. Further than that, cotton will be much more expensive, you will have a more expensive wrapping around this cotton and will be driving another nail into the coffin of the American cotton market.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I am hoping that you will pay strict attention to the short statement I expect to make in reply to the gentleman. The jute bagging interests appeared before the Senate committee and here is what they said:

I hope that you leave the bill open, just net weight. I will just say, for example, that there might be a half dozen different standards and specifications, and in that way it will leave the door open for various types of suitable and economical coverings that are available. I have seen considerable foreign cotton, especially in South America. There is no doubt about it, they put up a far better bale than we do. They have much more modern ginpress boxes than we have.

This, as you see, would leave the door wide open. What is going to happen? Twenty-one pounds of this same jute as a legal standard sells below the price of the 15-pound cotton covering. Brother, the jute people, every one of them, will vote for it because we will continue to use 21 pounds of jute. It will displace cotton because we cannot compete with that kind of jute. Then, too, we shall lose the freight and the insurance and millions of dollars referred to by the gentlemen from the Department, who stated that by bringing the tare, bagging, and ties down to 15 pounds we would save these freights, insurance, and waste.

The jute interests endorse this amendment for the reasons stated; and, take it from me, because I have studied this question all these years, if you adopt this amendment we will continue to use this jute, and you will not have done anything in the interest of the farmer, because he pays the freight and the insurance, and we will not consume any additional cotton. I am sure that nobody interested in the farmers would offer such an amendment. It is an amendment that is perfectly satisfactory, as I stated, to the jute people.

And now about the weight of the cotton covering. The gentleman said that maybe it ought to be a pound and a half. Through all these years, Mr. Chairman, we have given millions of dollars to the Secretary of Agriculture for research. They have perfected a bagging here that does not weigh quite the 14 ounces referred to in the bill. This bagging has proven much better than any other material, having been tested in shipping to Germany and back still in perfect condition, whereas cotton wrapped in jute undergoing that journey would come back all ragged, as we usually see them.

They state that I have picked out a bad jute covering to present to you. This sample is much better than the average bagging of this type used. This was manufactured some years ago. The stuff they are putting out today is not even as good as this. So, based on tests that have been made, the weight of the cotton covering will not have to exceed the amount that has been placed in the bill.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. FIII.MER. I vield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. As I understand it, if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is adopted it will absolutely destroy the force and effectiveness of the bill.

Mr. FULMER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. We might just as well kick the bill out of the window as to pass it with the gentleman's amendment. The jute interests are all for this type of an amendment because its adoption would mean the continued use by the cotton industry of this old heavy jute bagging, and would mean that we would not have this additional use for some 200,000 bales of American cotton.

Let us for once, instead of talking about doing something for the farmers, do something for them. And I mean just what I say. I say to the West, and to every other section of the country, that our problem is theirs. Unless we can settle it, we can go into the dairy business, we can go into the hog business, we can go into the cattle business, we can go into the grain business. This is a national problem. I ask that you vote down this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Clason) there were-ayes 29, noes 73.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Chairman, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The division vote just taken discloses a quorum is present.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman submitted his motion in writing?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. No; but I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read until the gentleman submits his motion in writing.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That except as provided in section 2 of this act, it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any bale of cotton ginned after the effective date of the United States Official Cotton Tare Standards on which the bagging, ties, or patches do not conform with such United States Official Cotton Tare Standards.

No person shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this section when he can establish a guaranty signed by the manufacturer, wholesaler, jobber, or other party residing within the United States by whom such bagging, ties, or patches were sold, to the effect that the same conform with said United States Official Cotton Tare Standards. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such bale covering materials, and in such case such party or parties making such sale shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach in due course to the shipper under the provisions of this act.

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to examine and test bale covering materials and samples thereof for the purpose of determining whether such materials conform with the United States Official Cotton Tare Standards, and to promulgate regulations for submitting samples of bale covering materials for examination and testing.

SEC. 4. That from and after the effective date of the United States Official Cotton Tare Standards it shall be unlawful for any person to buy or sell or to offer to buy or sell any American cotton for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce except according to the net weight of the cotton involved, excluding in each instance the weight of bagging, ties, and patches.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause such investigations and tests to be made as he may find to be necessary in order to determine practical means for the permanent identification of different types of bales of cotton by the use of markers, tags, and other devices which will facilitate the effective administration of this act, and by public notice to prescribe standard specifications for such markers, tags, and other devices. Such standard specifications or any change or replacement thereof shall become effective on and after a date specified in the order of the Secretary establishing the same, which shall be not 1 than 1 year after the date of such order, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any person to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce any bale of American cotton ginned after such effective date which does not bear a tag, marker, or other device conforming with such standard specifications.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause to be promulgated such regulations, may cause SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause ture shall cause to be promulgated such regulations, may cause such investigations, tests, demonstrations, and publications to be made as he shall find to be necessary; and he is hereby authorized made as he shall find to be necessary; and he is hereby authorized to cooperate with any department or agency of the Government, any State, Territory, District, or possession, or department, agency, or political subdivisions thereof, or any person, in carrying out the provisions of this act, and he shall have the power to appoint, remove, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees not in conflict with existing law, and to make such expenditures for printing, books of reference, technical newspapers and periodicals, furniture, stationery, office equipment, travel, and other supplies and expenses as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act in the District of Columbia and elsewhere.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion to strike out the enacting clause, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Schaffer of Wisconsin moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Schafer].

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The duties devolving upon the Secretary of Agriculture under this act may with equal force and effect be executed by such officers and agents of the Department of Agriculture as he may designate for the purpose.

Sec. 8. Any person who shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of this act or of any regulation made in pursuance hereof; or any person who shall knowingly represent by misbranding or otherwise that any bale covering material sold or offered for sale or shipped or delivered for shipment in interstate foreign commerce conforms with the United States Official Cotton Tare Standards when in fact such bale covering material does not conform with such standards; or any person who shall forcibly assault, impede, resist, interfere with, or influence improperly, or intend to influence improperly, any person employed under this act in the pursuance of his dutles, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. Fulmer: Page 7, line 1, strike out "intend" and insert the word "attempt."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sec. 9. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 10. If any provision of this act or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEAVY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 57) to provide for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign commerce transactions in cotton, to provide for the standardization of bale covering for cotton, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I demand the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is obviously impossible at this juncture of the proceedings to have the engrossed copy read. The bill will, therefore, go over until tomorrow, the previous question having been ordered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke on the pending bill may have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL SEED ACT

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, I call up the bill (H. R. 5625) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in seeds; to require labeling and to prevent misrepresentation of seeds in interstate commerce; to require certain standards with respect to certain imported seeds; and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5625, with Mr. Leavy in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, this bill is to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in seeds; to require labeling and to prevent misrepresentation of seeds in interstate commerce; to require certain standards with regard to certain imported seeds; and to curb the spread of noxious weed seeds.

This bill is very important to the farmers of this country. It has gone through a stage of evolution over a period of 2 years. The bill as presented represents the best thought of the seed trade, the farm groups, the association of official analysts, and the State departments of agriculture. This bill and its predecessors which I introduced have been before the House for the last 2 years. No attempt has been made to bring it before the House until the provisions of the bill could be generally agreed upon by the various groups affected. All the groups are now in accord on this bill with the exception of one provision in the bill, section 203, on page 17, the amendment that was incorporated in the bill by the Committee on Agriculture. It is known as the farmer exemption. I will grant that the exemption as provided is too broad and should be restricted. I have had a number of letters, as I presume you have, asking that this exemption be further restricted. At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to this section of the bill which I believe will take care of the objections to that particular provision that have been raised.

The amendment I expect to offer is as follows:

Page 17, line 11, strike out the period and insert "And provided further. That such seeds produced or sold by him are in compliance with the seed laws of the State into which the seed is transported."

I believe this amendment will close the door to inferior seeds that might be brought over the State line and sold into a State which has strict seed laws prohibiting its own citizens from selling seeds that are not properly labeled or that contain noxious-weed seeds. This provision would make the man who sells across a State line comply with the law of the State into which he transports the seed.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. At the present time, as I understand, it is impossible for State authorities to regulate shipments in interstate commerce.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Therefore, the amendment to be proposed by the gentleman will take care of that situation, so the local State laws will govern all seeds shipped into the State.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the proviso the gentleman will offer require the farmer to label his seeds?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. It will require the farmer to label his seeds in the event the State into which he ships them requires that of its own citizens.

Mr. COCHRAN. What is the situation generally in the States of the country?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I believe there are about 17 States that require labeling; there may be more. There are 47 States that have seed laws. I understand only one State, the State of Georgia, has no seed law.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman see any particularly good reason why the farmers who are growing seeds definitely for sale should be exempted from the provisions of the bill as it is set up?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I may say to the gentleman that I believe the law should apply to all equally, but in the interest of getting much-needed legislation through it becomes necessary at times to make certain compromises and provide certain exemptions. I may say that a number of States are eliminating farmer exemptions in their seed laws. I believe it would be better for the States to pioneer that field rather than for the Federal Government. Under this amendment the Federal law would automatically support the State laws. As the State laws become stricter the Federal law could become stricter. Our present Federal seed law is inadequate and unenforceable.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There seems to be some misunderstanding with regard to the gentleman's amendment. I believe we should clear it up. Let me cite an illustration. I am a farmer living in the State of Minnesota. I want to ship seed down into the State of Iowa to my friend, Brother Gilchrist. Must I comply with the laws of the State of Iowa in order to get that seed over to him, or is it satisfactory that I comply with the laws of the State of Minnesota?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Under this amendment the gentleman would have to comply with the laws of the State into which the seed is transported.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Therefore, I would have to comply with the laws of the State of Iowa with regard to the shipment of seed.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The seed is transported in Minnesota, and the gentleman would have to comply with the laws of Minnesota.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. If he is shipping it into the State of Iowa, he would have to comply with the laws of the State of Iowa.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. That is correct; otherwise, the gentleman's amendment would not take care of interstate shipments.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. This bill applies only to interstate shipments of seed for seed purposes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The seed in the case spoken of is transported in the State of Minnesota. The gentleman assumes he is selling me seed. He lives in Minnesota and I live in Iowa. The amendment does not apply at all unless the seed is transported by the farmer in Minnesota. He transports it first in Minnesota, for that is where the transportation commences, and under the gentleman's amendment the farmer must comply with the laws of the State in which it is transported; that is, Minnesota.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Into which it is being transported. The word is "into."

Mr. GILCHRIST. It does not say "into"; it says "in."

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. "Into" is the way the amendment reads.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Let me suggest to my friend from Iowa that if he comes to me at my farm in Minnesota and buys the seed from me there, then all I have to do is comply with the laws of Minnesota; but if I attempt to ship the seed from my farm in Minnesota to his farm in Iowa, I would then have to comply with the laws of the State of Iowa.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. What regulation would there be under the amendment and under the bill in the sale of cottonseed? Of course, they have no trash weeds or anything of that kind.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Cottonseed would have to meet the same requirements in the event it was sold for seed purposes. This bill only regulates seeds sold for seed purposes in interstate commerce.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. The bill would require anyone who shipped seeds in several States to follow the seed laws of all those States in order to be able to ship his seeds into such States.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. At the present time all the legitimate seed houses that do sell in the various States comply with the State laws.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am speaking of the individual farmer provided for under this exemption.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. If the individual farmer were to sell in various States, naturally, he would have to comply with the laws of the States into which he is shipping.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me to clarify somewhat the discussion we have been having here on the gentleman's amendment? As I understand, that does not become effective and there is no regulation until it becomes a matter of interstate shipment.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. That is true.

Mr. STEFAN. For instance, the farmer in Nebraska, which is your State and mine, who wishes to sell his seeds within the State, would not be regulated until the time his seeds crossed the State line into Minnesota or Iowa, and we are not dealing here with anything but interstate commerce.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. The gentleman is correct. It applies only to interstate shipments, and, naturally, there are relatively few sales by farmers that cross State lines.

I would now like to read this wire which I have just received:

Members of the board of directors of the American Farm Bureau Federation in session here today adopted unanimously following resolution: On behalf of our members in 40 States, we strongly urge the enactment by Congress at this session of the Coffee seed bill in order to protect the farmers against adulteration, misbranding, and false advertising of seeds.

EDWARD O'NEAL, President, American Farm Bureau Federation.

I may say that the seed policy committee, appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, which is composed of technically informed men who know the intricacies of the seed business, served for the last year and a half in helping to work out the provisions of this bill in various conferences with the legislative committee of the American Seed Trade and the various farm groups, seed analysts, State commissioners of agriculture, and others. It is a highly technical bill, but a general agreement has been reached among all the groups on all the provisions of the bill, I believe, with the exception of section 203. The committee amendment that I will offer will, I think, take care of the main objections that have been raised on that issue.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Hinshaw].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I very much favor the Seed Regulation Act, but there is one part of it in particular which makes noxious-weed control very difficult to handle. The principal difficulty in the bill is the exemption of farmers from its provisions as just mentioned by the acting chairman of the committee.

May I ask the gentleman if I may have his amendment so I can read it.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. The amendment reads, "Provided further, That such seeds produced or sold by him are in compliance with the seed laws of the State into which the seed is transported."

This would mean that any farmer who is raising seeds as a business must comply with the laws of the 47 States that have seed laws. It is going to be a very difficult thing, not only for him to follow out the laws, but for the enforcing officers to enforce them. If one ships seed from the State of my friend from Minnesota into the State of Iowa, I do not see how anybody is going to check up on the seed in accordance with the laws of the State of Iowa when the seed arrives there, and the package may contain all kinds of noxious-weed seeds in it.

When the bill is read for amendment I am going to propose that we strike that portion of the bill after the word "act", in line 2, and all of lines 3 to 11, inclusive, part of which is already proposed to be stricken out, as I understand it; so that the farmer who is in the seed business must comply with the act completely.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.
Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman refers to page 17, lines 9, 10, and 11, which is an exemption insofar as the farmer is concerned, but there is a proviso starting in line 10, which reads: "Provided such farmer is not engaged in the business of selling seeds not produced by him."

Mr. HINSHAW. That is right, but on the other hand, he may be engaged in selling a half dozen or a dozen kinds of seed that are produced by him and which may carry with them noxious-weed seeds.

Mr. COCHRAN. Of course, I understand what the gentleman is getting at. He does not want some farmer to be producing seed and then be exempted so that he might, to use the term, bootleg seeds that have not been examined.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is correct.
Mr. COCHRAN. In the end the farmer who buys the seed will suffer most.

Mr. HINSHAW. It is the farmer who buys the seed and his neighbors and his neighbors' neighbors who will suffer under that part of the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman feel that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr.

COFFEE] will meet that objection?

Mr. HINSHAW. I believe it would, if there was anybody who could check up and see that the seeds complied with the State law in respect to seeds.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does not the gentleman think that the proper authorities in every State would check up on the seeds?

Mr. HINSHAW. That is possible, but the package might be shipped by mail, direct, or by express, in which case it would be difficult for anybody to locate.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. In the instance to which the gentleman has referred, where the seed is shipped by mail, it is the man who receives the seed who will make the complaint if the seeds are not up to the guaranty placed on them by the farmer who ships them.

Mr. HINSHAW. He can prove that if he holds out enough seed to be tested afterward, but after he has once planted the seed and something grows that should not be there nobody could tell, and his farm would already be infested with

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. And at the present time the farmer who lives outside a State has no recourse because he cannot get recourse in his own State.

Mr. HINSHAW. That is true, but this act provides that there shall be inspection and grading of seeds, and I believe the act is a good one from that point of view, but I think it should apply equally to all persons who provide seed.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There is no question but that the gentleman is correct there, when you come to regulate the seed dealers and farmers engaged in selling seed commercially, but there are many instances, particularly in our section of the country, where farmers will raise alfalfa. say, have a few bags of seed for sale or produce and sell seed corn, and I think they should have a right to deal with their neighbors.

Mr. HINSHAW. They have that right to deal with their neighbors in the State in accordance with the State laws. This refers to interstate shipment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. But if they comply with the State laws in which they live, they should be taken care of, and this does take care of them.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 more minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the producer or farmer has the opportunity of having his seed cleaned and tested for him by a custom cleaner or he may have his own cleaning equipment. He also has opportunity of having the seeds tested free of charge at a State or Federal seed laboratory. He can also sell to the dealer or jobber without cleaning or testing. The exemption which has been inserted in the bill is not necessary to the proper marketing of seed by the producer or farmer.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Is the gentleman in favor of seeing this bill enacted?

Mr. HINSHAW. I am.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I say that if the gentleman is, he would not consider any move toward removing this exemption from the bill?

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not understand that.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. In other words, if there is no exemption for the farmer from the provisions of this act, I do not see how anyone interested in the farmers of the Nation could vote for it.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the farmers are interested in themselves, they are interested in prohibiting the spread of noxious-weed seeds.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Has the gentleman ever farmed?

Mr. HINSHAW. I have, but not extensively. I am a member of the Los Angeles County Farm Bureau.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. May I suggest that there are lots of cases where a man, needing a little seed, goes to his neighbor, who perhaps lives on the other side of a State line. For instance, I do that myself. I live on a farm about 12 miles from the Dakota line, and in many cases I have gone across the line and got a little jag of seeds.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not think this law would seriously prevent you from doing that.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I think it would.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I can see the objection that the gentleman has where a farmer in a State might be forced to comply with the regulations and laws of 47 other States, but this provision might lead to a uniformity of legislation with reference to seeds. In fact, they are working that way now.

Mr. HINSHAW. Any act regulating interstate commerce should apply equally to everyone, in my opinion.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent I desire to make a statement which I made to the press not long ago and which I think is appropriate at this time.

The King of Great Britain and the Emperor of the British Empire and those accompanying him, it goes without saying, should be received with respect and dignity on the occasion of their visit to this country.

It is the first time since the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus that any sovereign of this imperial government has come to this continent. Such a visit, however, might have been more fortunate at another time. It comes now at a time when heavy war clouds overhang the British Empire-when Europe is on the brink of war, and when the course which the United States shall follow in the event of European war is of uppermost concern, to us and to Europe.

In diplomacy, as well as historic perspective, such a visit of a reigning monarch to the head of another nation is not a private visit. It is an affair of state.

History reveals that the various royal visits to France almost invariably were accompanied by political commitments and frequently followed by war.

In June of 1908 the King of Great Britain and the Emperor of the British Empire visited Russia for the first time. It is a fact of historic record that the political understanding or entente between the Russian and British Empires coincided with that royal visit. Six years later that understanding or entente brought Russia into the World War as the ally of Great Britain. That war cost the Czar his throne and was followed by the destruction of Russia and the political control of that pitiable country by homicidal Communists.

The question now arises whether the unprecedented visit of the British King to the United States and to the White House does in fact publicly signify and confirm an entente or military understanding between President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull and the British Government for the preservation of the British Empire at the expense of American blood and American treasure.

Whatever the real facts may be, there is not the least doubt that both in Europe and Asia it is commonly believed that such an understanding and alliance has been made, although Secretary Hull, with a Machiavellian touch, has described our policy as one of "parallel action." This is the very phrase used by Hitler and Mussolini with regard to their cooperation previous to their now announced military treaty.

Under these circumstances it is incumbent upon the President and the Secretary of State to make public proclamation and affirmation of the neutrality of the United States, both in Europe and Asia, and the freedom of the United States from any alliance, written or spoken; and if these executive officers of our Government fail or neglect to do so, then it is incumbent upon the Congress by appropriate resolution to give notice to the world and reassurance to the people in the United States that the United States is not the pawn and ally of the British Empire.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman is very familiar with royal etiquette. When the King and Queen of Great Britain come here to visit us, how soon thereafter must the President and his wife visit the royal couple of Great Britain?

Mr. TINKHAM. My familiarity with royal etiquette is not sufficiently adequate to answer that question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman know whether the King and Queen have obtained a visa and whether or not the deportation zealots on the Committee on Immigration have investigated into that question?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not; but I assume they have not. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time, and I ask that the bill may be read.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Federal Seed Act."

Amendment offered by Mr. Coffee of Nebraska to the committee amendment: On page 17, line 11, after the word "him", strike out the period, insert a comma and the words "Provided further, That such seeds produced or sold by him are in compliance with the seed laws of the State into which the seed is transported."

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I feel that this amendment should be accepted. It has been discussed fully with the members of the committee, and with one exception all have agreed to the amendment.

The amendment provides that a farmer shipping seed across a State line must comply with the laws of the State into which the seed is shipped; for instance, without this amendment a farmer living outside a certain State might sell substandard seed into that particular State and thus do what the citizens of that State themselves could not do under their State law. In other words, it is going to make the man who is selling seed across a State line comply with the laws of the State into which the seed is shipped. I may say in passing that a very small percentage of the seed sold is sold by farmers across State lines.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Would this bill prohibit alfalfa growers who might happen to reside in Oklahoma where our farmers grow as fine grade alfalfa as can be found anywhere in the world, from shipping their seed across the line into Texas, Arkansas, Kansas, or any other State?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I will say to the gentleman that if your Oklahoma grower is not engaged in the business of selling seed not produced by him and sells his own seed directly to the consumer in another State, he would be required under this amendment to comply with the seed law of the State into which the seed is transported. If the seed is not being sold directly from the grower to the consumer and goes into interstate commerce, it must be labeled in accordance with the provisions of this bill showing its origin, germination, and so forth. In that connection, I want to say to my friend from Oklahoma that one of the most flagrant abuses which this measure seeks to correct is the misrepresentation of southern alfalfa seed which is not adapted to the northern climate. The same practice prevails in connection with certain northern seeds that are not adapted to the South. There are no labeling requirements under our present Federal seed law and as a consequence some itinerant truckers and some unscrupulous dealers sell vast quantities of southern unadapted alfalfa seed in Northern States which results in millions of dollars of loss to the farmers who plant this seed that winter-kills. This bill is designed to protect the seed buyer. It requires in the case of alfalfa that the place of origin be stated on the label. If the farmer knows where the seed was grown he knows whether or not it is adapted to his climatic conditions. Certainly he is entitled to this protection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I take it from the gentleman's remarks then that it is not the purpose of this bill to prevent the shipping of alfalfa seed from the South to the North, but only make it certain that good seeds are shipped.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. This measure will curb the shipping of unadapted alfalfa seed from the South to the North. It will also curb the sales in the South of northerngrown unadapted seeds. I do not know how far north the Oklahoma alfalfa seed would be adapted. If we put the information on the label the legitimate seed dealer as well as the farmer will be protected. If the seed is adapted the farmer will buy it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I may say to the gentleman from Nebraska that I have had a number of complaints from well-known alfalfa growers in Oklahoma, who specialize in growing very fine alfalfa seed, that Oklahoma seeds have been discriminated against by other sections of the country. Certainly I would not like to support a measure here to add more red tape and unreasonable restrictions, or a bill that might work a hardship on growers of good seeds in my own State of Oklahoma.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk. When will it be considered?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be taken up after the disposition of the committee amendments.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman provides that when a farmer sells direct, on his own farm, for transportation anywhere else, that farmer must comply with the law of the State into which the seed is transported.

Answering my friend here who propounded a question a while ago, if a farmer in South Dakota wished to sell seed in the State of Maine he would have to discover what the laws of the State of Maine were and comply with those laws, even though the transaction took place on his farm in South Dakota. To give the gentleman another illustration, even though a neighbor should come to this farmer to see a horse, a cow, or an ox, and during the course of the conversation they talked about seed corn, which, of course, does not contain noxious weeds, and Bill says to Jim: "Well, ship me some of that over into the State of Ohio," Bill living in Ohio and Jim in Illinois—that is an interstate transaction. It has been held over and over again by our courts that the sale in one State of a commodity for shipment into another State is an interstate transaction.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska differs from the amendment adopted by the committee. The amendment adopted by the committee would allow a farmer to sell on his own farm even though it went into interstate shipment. I think that is as far as we ought to go

I did not intend to object to the bill, although I am not inclined to be for it; but I think the committee amendment is much better than the pending amendment for the reason I have named. As stated by my friend from South Carolina the fact is that such a case does not happen once in 10,000 times, where a man in one State buys seed from a farmer on that other farmer's farm in another State; but when that does occur let the farmer who sells comply with the law of the State where the transaction occurs.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman's viewpoint. There are numerous cases of farmers living along State lines. These transactions should be measured by the law of the State where the transaction occurs, and not the law of some foreign State.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Does not the gentleman feel that if a farmer from Minnesota goes across the line into Iowa and buys seed from a farmer in Iowa that the transaction is completed in the State of Iowa?

Mr. GILCHRIST. We have a completed transaction in the State of Iowa, but that does not answer the question whether it is a Federal or non-Federal transaction. For instance, the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. Lemke], can tell you about his famous North Dakota provision covering the control of wheat. That was knocked out by the Supreme Court, because just as soon as the wheat was sold in North Dakota for shipment somewhere else it became an interstate transaction. Just the other day the Supreme Court held in a certain case practically the same thing. The actual sale of a thing on my farm in Iowa for transportation into a foreign State constitutes an interstate transaction.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I do not think there is any question about that. I believe the gentleman's interpretation is always good on this as well as many other subjects.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the pending amendment, and I can see no objection to it at all. I am also deeply interested in this bill.

During the past year I have made an intense study of the noxious-weed problem, and I was astonished, as well versed as I was in it before I made the study, at the extent of the spread of noxious weeds. They were being spread by seed companies, by experimental stations, and by farmers selling seed which contained noxious weeds. The loss every year runs into millions of dollars and has become so great that the Department of Agriculture is thoroughly aroused.

A former colleague of ours from Idaho introduced a weed-control bill in the Seventy-fourth and Seventy-fifth Congresses, but we could never get any action by the Department of Agriculture so that the bill could be brought before the Congress for consideration. Within the last 3 or 4 weeks the Department of Agriculture has admitted that these noxious weeds constitute a national problem. That Department is now cooperating with us in bringing a real noxious-weed bill into the Congress for consideration at the next session, when we shall ask for early hearings.

The pending amendment, Mr. Chairman, permits the control of seeds that farmers ship across State lines. Why should we not so provide? In Oregon we have been seeded down with white top, a noxious weed coming out of Idaho and across the line into Oregon. If they are going to sell seed from Idaho over in Oregon let them comply with the Oregon law. Most of the Western States have pure-seed laws now. This law is needed, however, for interstate shipments. I think a farmer should have some leeway, as provided in this bill. However, the original bill was too broad, but through the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Coffee], it is brought into proper shape, so that it is practical and useful. The bill should be passed with this amendment.

The fear of our friend and colleague, the gentleman from Iowa, is simply drawn out of the blue. As has been stated, it is one of those things that perhaps will never happen. Farmers who have seed to sell are not numerous. However, if a farmer is going to ship seed from Idaho into Oregon, or if a farmer in Oregon is going to ship seed into Washington, he ought to know and can easily find out about the seed laws of the State into which he is going to ship.

Let him comply with those laws. That is all there is to this.

I am very much in favor of the amendment.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. We are just simply discussing a condition where one farmer sells to another on a farmer's farm.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Yes. And he should comply with the law where the seed is going.

Mr. GILCHRIST. We are only dealing with one subject, where one farmer sells another on a farmer's farm, and the farmer who sells is not engaged in business. That is all we are talking about.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Yes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. There can be no harm in allowing the farmer who is not engaged in the business to sell. When his cousin comes over and says, "Let me have a bushel of this," and he sells it, and if it does not comply with the State law then he goes to the penitentiary.

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. Let him comply with the law of the State where the seed is going.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE of Oregon. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. May I say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Gilchrist] the bill as it stands provides for the farmer who sells directly to the consumer. It does not mean he must sell on the farm. He can sell directly to the consumer by going across the State line and delivering in the other State.

Mr. GILCHRIST. It is an interstate transaction if he goes into the other State.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment to the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Coffee].

The committee amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hinshaw: Page 17, line 2, after the word "Act" strike out the semicolon, the balance of line 2 and all of lines 3 to 11, inclusive, and insert a period.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to make the act applicable to all alike. If we could all realize how very important to our farmers is the control of noxious weeds, I am sure you would wish to see that all people who dispense seeds are treated equally and alike.

One can conceive of a tremendous complication to the farmer engaged commercially in the seed business, so to speak, selling some particular seed which he grows and shipping that seed into three or four different States, in trying to determine and carry out the laws of the several States into which he would ship the seed. My amendment does not affect the farmer who sells seed to his neighbor in his own State; it simply eliminates the exemption to the farmer who is in the seed-growing and selling business, growing the seed himself and selling direct to the consumer in other States, placing him on the same responsible basis as others affected by this act.

On June 17, 1938, a conference was held called the Western Weed Control Conference, at Denver, Colo. A number of resolutions of very great importance were prepared, offered, and adopted by that conference. They brought out the fact, for example, that there was no way to control noxious weeds on the Indian reservations at the present time or in the United States forest lands and national parks, and that the situation in those places could get out of hand very easily.

I commend the committee for bringing this bill to the House. It seems to be a good one. I hope my amendment will be adopted to make the act uniform for all people who are dispensing seeds. [Applause.] In this connection I want to present a letter from the Department of Agriculture of my State and certain of the resolutions that I have referred to, as follows:

> STATE OF CALIFORNIA. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, Sacramento, May 19, 1939.

Hon. CARL HINSHAW.

Congressional Representative,

Eleventh California District,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HINSHAW: I know you are fully aware of the significance of sound weed control as an aid to agriculture. Last year, for the first time, the Western States got together for the purpose of discussing and correlating their weed-control problems. At that conference a number of resolutions were adopted, copies At that conference a number of resolutions were adopted, copies of which I am enclosing. The subject matter of these resolutions was significant in the discussions, and it was intended that these resolutions be forwarded to you for your consideration in connection with any legislation which might come before the Congress pertaining to weed control, seed inspection, and basic research work in the weed-control field. In the case of the latter there have been requests for a correlation of fundamental fact finding and research in weed-control practices within the United States Department of Agriculture for a good many years. We recall that the Western Plant Quarantine Board on a number of occasions brought this matter to the attention of the Federal agencies which were engaged in the different phases of weedagencies which were engaged in the different phases of control investigation, but which were not then thoroughly cor-relating them with other Federal patronage. There has been a beginning toward this correlation, but much more is necessary. We are hopeful that you will recognize that real progress is being made in weed suppression generally in the West, and that any assistance which can be given by the Congress in supporting this work will be helpful.

any assistance which can be given by the Congress in supporting this work will be helpful.

The second of the western weed-control conferences will be held in California within a few weeks, and I am sure that those in attendance will be interested in any comments that you may have relative to the present status of weed and seed legislation.

Very sincerely,

W. C. JACOBSEN, Assistant to the Director.

Resolution No. 3

NOXIOUS WEEDS ON INDIAN LANDS

(Adopted at Western Weed Control Conference, Denver, Colo., June 17, 1938)

Whereas there are several Indian reservations in the territory served by the Western States Noxious Weed Committee; and Whereas there is no way in which State laws seeking to eradicate and control noxious weeds through taxation can affect Indian land without an act of Congress; and Whereas noxious-weed control must, of necessity, be applied to all lands within the weed-infested district uniformly: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the noxious weed committee, in conference Resolved, That the noxious weed committee, in conference assembled, at Denver, Colo., June 16 and 17, 1938, recommend that eradication work be financed by the Federal Government on all Indian lands, the title to which rests in itself, to its proportionate share, either by the employment of C. C. C. labor or a direct contribution to the agencies directing the control activities in those districts in which the Indian land lies.

Resolution No. 4

FEDERAL RESERVES, NATIONAL FORESTS AND PARKS (Adopted at Western Weed Control Conference, Denver, Colo., June 17, 1938)

Whereas there are vast areas of federally owned land in the ter ritory represented by the Western Weed Control Conference; and

Whereas there is no way in which State laws seeking to eradicate and control noxious weeds through taxation can affect Federal reserves, national forests, national parks, or other Governmentowned lands without an act of Congress; and Whereas infestations of noxious weeds occur on said Federal lands and persist as a menace to surrounding lands; and Whereas noxious-weed control must be applied to all lands within a weed-infested district uniformly: Therefore be it Resolved, That the Western Weed Control Conference, in convention assembled, at Denver, Colo., June 16 and 17, 1938, recommend that eradication work be financed by the Federal Govern-ment on all Federal reserves, national forests, national parks and other Government-owned land, the title to which rests to its proportionate share, either by the employment of C. C. C. labor or a direct contribution to the agencies directing the control activities in those districts in which the Government-owned lands

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of farmer exemption was very thoroughly discussed in the committee. No part of this bill received more careful or thorough consideration than that question. The committee did not want to impose any hardship upon a farmer who might incidentally sell seed to his neighbor when the neighbor happened to live just across a State line. On the other hand, the committee felt that the bill would not be complete and effective unless there was some provision in it that would prevent commercial seed growers who might produce their own seed from selling seed in violation of the laws of the States in which the seeds were

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman believe it is any more difficult for a man to carry out the laws of the State in which the seed is sold, if it is another State than his own, than it would be to comply with the provisions of the act itself?

Mr. HOPE. In one case it might be easier, and in another case it might be more difficult.

Mr. HINSHAW. I mean particularly where he has to comply with the laws of perhaps three or four States. Under my amendment he has to comply only with the Federal statute.

Mr. HOPE. I do not believe the situation the gentleman mentions would arise. The man we want to protect under this amendment is the farmer who is simply selling seeds to his neighbor. There is no reason why he should keep records as provided in this bill. There is no reason why he should label his seeds as provided in this bill, because the neighbor who buys them is perfectly aware of the kind of crops his farmer neighbor is growing and is perfectly aware of whether or not that farm is infected with noxious weeds.

Consequently, there does not exist the necessity for protection that would exist where he is buying seeds from a dealer or from someone who is hundreds of miles away. Therefore, this amendment offered by the committee seemed to be a good compromise which would at the same time protect the farmer who is selling seeds and the farmer who is buying seeds, and that is what the committee wanted to do.

If you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from California you will be forcing Farmer A, who lives across the State line in Oklahoma and sells a load of seed wheat to his neighbor in Kansas, not only to label that seed and go to all that expense, but to keep records and make reports regularly and comply with all the other rules and regulations the Department enforcing this law may require. There is no necessity for that. Under the committee amendment, the farmer who is making the selling of seed a business will have to comply with the laws of the States in which he is selling seeds, and that, it seems to me, offers ample protection to the farmer who is buying seeds.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Does the gentleman feel that the adoption of this amendment as offered by the gentleman from California would jeopardize the passage of the bill, in view of the discussion we had in our committee?

Mr. HOPE. I believe it would. As I said in the beginning, the committee discussed this matter at great length and the provisions which have been agreed upon represent a compromise among the members of the committee, among whom there were very divergent views. I believe it is the best possible compromise and solution of the matter. I feel it will not in any way weaken the law. I think it will protect the farmer who buys seeds and at the same time will protect the farmer who happens to be selling seeds incidentally on his own place from the annoyance, trouble, and the expense to which he would have to go if he had to comply literally and strictly with the law.

Mr. Chairman, I hope, the amendment will not be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I will take only a minute instead of the 5 minutes. As one of the few dirt farmers in this House, I believe it would be ridiculous to put on the necks of thousands of farmers in this Nation the chance of having clamped onto them a $2,000 penalty just because they made a mistake, perhaps, in dealing with their cousins or fathers or brothers across State lines in a small sale of seed, not knowing that they were violating thereby a Federal statute.

I hope this amendment will be defeated. I think we have gone far enough in hamstringing the farmers of the Nation today. I did not object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Coffee]. I feel it was fair.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. No; I will not yield.

I repeat, I did not object to that particular amendment. As a farmer, I am willing to go halfway; but here in this bill, if you take this exemption for the farmers out of the bill, you are simply voting to put each and every farmer living along a State line in the United States of America under the cloud of perhaps having to pay a $2,000 fine, when very darn few of them could even raise $500-and just because of a Federal statute they knew nothing about.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. In just a minute.

At the same time I wonder why a penalty of $2,000 should be assessed under this bill when in the bill we considered for 3 hours this afternoon in connection with cotton there is a penalty of only $500. Should we be more lenient with the cotton speculators in the South than with the farmers of the United States of America? [Applause.]

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Certainly, I will yield. Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. The gentleman realizes that the penalty is not to exceed $2,000.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. The $2,000, however, is in the bill just the same as the $200 a month the other day was in the Townsend bill.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Absolutely.

Mr. HOPE. Does not the gentleman feel that if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW] it will do what a great many seed dealers want to do, and that is to prevent farmers from selling any seeds on the farms.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. It will do more than that, Mr. HOPE, it will defeat this bill, if this amendment prevails.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 7, line 7, and vacate the proceedings by which a previous amendment that was offered was agreed to, and to offer one in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Coffee of Nebraska: On page 7, line 7, after the word "regulations", strike out the words "of or generally in" and insert the word "of."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEAVY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5625) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in seeds; to require labeling, and to prevent misrepresentation of seeds in interstate commerce; to require certain standards with respect to certain imported seeds; and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT, 1921

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture, I call up the bill H. R. 4998, to amend the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi calls up the bill H. R. 4998, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsections (a) and (b) of section 310 of the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921, are hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"(a) May determine and prescribe what will be the just and reasonable rate or charge, or rates or charges, to be thereafter in such case observed as both the maximum and minimum to be such case observed as both the maximum and minimum to be charged, and what regulation or practice is or will be just, reasonable, and nondiscriminatory to be thereafter followed; and "(b) May make an order that such owner or operator (1) shall cease and desist from such violation to the extent to which the Secretary finds that it does or will exist; (2) shall not thereafter publish, demand, or collect any rate or charge for the furnishing of stockyard services more or less than the rate or charge so prescribed; and (3) shall conform to and observe the regulation or practice so prescribed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with further proceedings under Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5610, making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities, chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference with the Senate, and that the Speaker name the conferees on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 5610, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. Collins. Mr. Casey of Massachusetts, Mr. Mahon, Mr. Stefan, and Mr. Case of South Dakota.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon one phase of the pending socialsecurity bill and to insert in the RECORD a very comprehensive letter from an insurance man from my State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the life, character, and public record of the late Representative Allard H. Gasque.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial which recently appeared in the Boston

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include a brief article by one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include a brief amendment which I intend to offer to the social-security bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the House will have under consideration again tomorrow the Social Security Act and bill H. R. 6635, which makes amendments to that act.

I shall offer two amendments to that bill. The first of these will be offered in line 20 of page 2, after the word "assistance." At that point is found a provision regarding the method to be employed by State agencies in determining need. My amendment will add the following language:

And (the State agency shall) consider reasonable proof that the annual income of any such person (claiming old-age assistance) is less than $360 as prima facie evidence of need.

The purpose of this amendment is obvious. It is to get away, to some degree at least, from the present system, in effect in every State so far as I know, whereby it is necessary for a person to practically prove himself a pauper in order to qualify for any assistance at all. Under this amendment, for example, a county could not require an aged person to sign away title to his little home in order to qualify for a few dollars a month assistance.

The second amendment which I shall offer will come on page 97, after line 5. This amendment will insert a new section-section 704-in the bill to read as follows:

Title X of the Social Security Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the word "blind", wherever it occurs in such title, the following: "or persons physically disabled to such a degree as to be unable to engage in a gainful occupation."

The principle contained in this amendment is, I think, Why should we provide social security for one type of disability only and not for others which, though perhaps less dramatic, may render an individual quite as helpless as though he were blind? This, however, is what we are doing now. My amendment seeks to correct that situation.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain letters and telegrams received by me and referred to in my remarks today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the national old-age pension plan.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made in the House today and to include therein a letter from the Department of Agriculture of the State of California and sundry resolutions passed by the Western Wheat Control Conference at Denver, Colo.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under special order I was granted permission to address the House for 30 minutes today. HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have today introduced a resolution for the creation of a select committee. Section 2 of that resolution provides as follows:

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the committee to make a thorough study and investigation of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation (hereinafter called the Corporation) with particular reference to (a) the status of all bonds and mortgages, real estate, and other securities, or property owned or held by or for the Corporation; (b) the existence of sources for the disposition, by sale or otherwise, of said bonds and mortgages, real estate, and other securities, or property owned or held by or for the Corporation; (c) the methods and procedure most advisable, practical, and feasible to effect a liquidation and disposition of the bonds and mortgages, real estate, and other securities or property owned or held by or for the Corporation; and (d) to make recommendations to the House of Representatives with respect to legislation upon the foregoing subjects and for the carrying out of the findings and conclusions of the committee hereby created.

The committee shall report to the House of Representatives, on or before February 1, 1940, the results of its study and investigation, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable.

I have asked for this opportunity to discuss my views with reference to the subject matter of this resolution and I appreciate being granted the privilege of addressing the House.

I trust that I need not dwell too long upon the fact that by the introduction of this resolution it was not, and is not now, my intention to attempt to discredit the H. O. L. C., its officers, or employees, nor to belittle the beneficial accomplishments of the vast program of that instrumentality of the Congress. The written record of those accomplishments would be the most effective answer to any such attempt. The strengthening of the morale of the people whose homes were thus saved cannot be measured and the benefits that flowed therefrom cannot be overstated. For anyone to attempt to criticize that act or its general administration would indeed be inappropriate, and I have no such idea.

I am motivated in submitting this proposal to the House at this time by a keen desire to bring before the House what appear to me to be facts warranting present action.

The refinancing operations of the H. O. L. C. ceased on June 12, 1936. The present principal operations of the Corporation are the collection and servicing of its outstanding loans and the management and sale of its acquired properties. In the Sixth Annual Report of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, for the year ending June 30, 1938, the Corporation stated:

Its objective is to conclude its operations, if possible, without loss to the Federal Government and the taxpayer, and to assist as many borrowers as possible to preserve and ultimately own their homes free and clear of debt.

With that objective, I am in accord and were I to state the objectives of my proposal, I might very well adopt the foregoing, in the same words.

The ultimate responsibility for the termination of any instrumentality of Government rests with the legislative branch and, with respect to this particular instrumentality, I submit that we should now begin an inquiry into the ways and means by which that may best be accomplished. It is conceded, I think, that we shall have to do it sometime.

Appreciating the vastness of the problem, I believe such an inquiry is desirable if we are intelligently, rationally, and unemotionally to deal with this subject. Not with fanfare or ulterior or political motives but in a methodical and constructive manner should the problem be met.

It must be acknowledged that the administration of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act has resulted in many improvements in the methods of home financing. The Corporation's use of the "direct reduction" type of mortgage has generally resulted in wider use of these long-term amortization mortgages. This form of mortgage, obviously, saves the home owner the expense of refinancing after a short term or of paying fees or premiums for extension of the principal secured by the mortgage. The application of the appraisal practices of the Corporation has had beneficial effects on the real-estate market throughout the country. The Corporation has undoubtedly focused attention upon the primary importance of the appraisal in the field of home ownership financing.

Its Federal home-building-service plan, placed in operation by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, has rendered fine service in coordinating the activities of home-financing agencies, architects, materials dealers, manufacturers, and building-trades contractors.

The greatest source of criticism that may properly be leveled at the Corporation has been the suffering of tax arrears. The Corporation stated in its sixth annual report, 1938, that 40 percent of the borrowers were delinquent in taxes for one or more of the years 1933 to 1937. One of the principal criticisms against the old mortgage companies was the crediting of payments to interest, that is, "income a/c," out of which salaries, and so forth, were paid, rather than first discharging the prior liens of unpaid taxes. I am informed, however, that the Corporation has definitely and successfully turned to the solution of the tax problem.

The securities of the Corporation may be classified into, first, the mortgage loans outstanding, and, second, the property owned or in process of ownership. According to the Corporation's statement of June 30, 1938, the mortgage loans, advances, and sales instruments had a face value of $2,265,000,000. Its property was worth approximately $500,000,000. In addition to these assets, the Corporation owns the entire capital of the Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corporation of $100,000,000 and has over $200,000,000 invested in savings and loans associations, both State and Federal.

The Corporation reports that there have been demands for far-reaching changes in its loan terms, most of which demands have led to the introduction of various resolutions and legislative proposals now pending before the House. The principal demands are: First, to lower the interest rate; second, to extend the amortization period; and, third, to introduce a moratorium on principal payments. The Corporation maintains that its terms are more liberal than generally ever before available, and, further, that it was not the intention to grant to the Corporation's borrowers outright Government subsidies. It was planned that the Corporation should be self-liquidating and that the loans were to be repaid with interest sufficient to cover the rate paid by the Corporation on its bonds. The present rate of interest on the Corporation's mortgages is 5 percent. A recent refinancing operation by the Corporation reduced the interest rate on its outstanding bonds to approximately 134 percent.

Each year from the beginning of its operations the Corporation has shown a deficit, which reached approximately $40,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year 1938. It is indisputable that a reduction of the rate of interest would necessarily increase the deficit unless the other income of the Corporation were greatly increased. The accruing deficits are further contributions by the Government to the program of the saving of the homes refinanced.

Much has and will be said on both sides with respect to the legislation pending before the Congress for liberalization of terms and policies of the Corporation. It is not to be denied that the mortgagors and, particularly, the delinquent mortgagors of the Corporation have been the subjects of strenuous organizing efforts on the part of certain The motives of those groups are not here questioned. It is quite apparent that such mortgagors will readily and more easily be influenced by the hopes and aims of those groups. One such group, I am informed, abandoned its activities after investigation by the postal authorities. The head of another group was one of the leading figures in an attempted taxpayers' strike in New York, a few years ago. I, with a number of my colleagues, have sincerely sought a solution of the problem, have sought to procure fair and adequate relief for the mortgagors who have not necessarily suffered a permanent reduction in income or a permanent change in status. We, as the mortgagors, I am sure, have been ever mindful of the fact that a modification of the existing contracts would result in an enormous expense and a considerable amount of work and there might be some question as to an invasion of the equity due to those who have been fortunate enough to maintain their loans on a current basis. If, however, there are presently in existence, methods or means by which these ends may be accomplished, without further expense to the taxpayers of the country, as such, the mortgagors or the Corporation, the time to begin to do that is now. I am fully conscious of, and appreciate the manifold complexities of this problem and my appreciation and consciousness have led me to the course which I am suggesting we take. If the Corporation can, without greater loss or operating deficits, be liquidated, that should be done.

In my discussion of this matter or in any suggestions that I might make, I do not intend to circumvent the prerogatives of the House nor to limit the scope of the inquiry, should it be authorized. I mean merely to state briefly some of the methods which I think might be studied in an effort to obtain our objectives.

In June 1938 the number of accounts in arrears 3 months or over amounted only to less than 10 percent of the total maturities and those 1 to 3 months less than 1 percent of the total maturities. It is stated by the Corporation, however, that nearly 50 percent of all borrowers in default are liquidating their arrearages by systematic payments, which means they are making regular payments for the liquidation of their arrears in addition to their current monthly remittances. The chairman of the board has stated that, as of December 31, 1938 (Appendix of the Record, 76th Cong., p. 2398), about 90 cents of every dollar due has been paid to date. He has been credited with saying some time ago that in about 42 States the Corporation had eliminated all the willful delinquents and those whose status had suffered permanent change. Further, he said—supra:

Only a minority of foreclosed H. O. L. C. borrowers lost out through a sheer inability to pay.

Under the provisions of the act of 1933 the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, within certain limits, to make investments in Federal and State chartered savings and loan associations which are members of the Federal home-loan bank system. The total of those investments, at the end of the fiscal year 1938, was almost $212,000,000.

I have always been of the opinion that the provisions for the revitalizing of these savings and loans associations were intended to provide an outlet for the liquidation of the bonds and mortgages of the Corporation. The results, however, have been that those savings and loans associations are for the most part soliciting the bonds secured by mortgages upon newly constructed dwellings, which mortgages are in turn insured by the Federal Housing Administration.

I am further informed that as a result of competition among lending institutions seeking approved Federal Housing Administration mortgage investments, that interest rates on those mortgages have been reduced in many cases to 4½ percent and in some instances 4 percent.

We have heard much of late with reference to idle capital and its inability to find profitable forms of investment. I am informed that a Newark, N. J., bank announced that it will no longer pay any interest on savings deposits. We who are imbued with an abiding faith in the future of our country know that there has been, and is now, no form of security more attractive than first mortgages on homes in America. That that is so is high tribute to the spirit and industry of the American home owner. We might well query the possibility and advisability of extending to the present mortgage loans held by the Corporation the insurance features of the Federal Housing Administration and inquire into the availability of sufficient funds among savings banks, insurance companies, and individuals to purchase those securities from the Corporation. Adequate safeguards might well be placed upon the terms of such sale, safeguards founded upon the experience of the Corporation and which would protect the borrowers as far as possible.

The constructive legislation enacted by the Congress during the past few years, including the Federal Housing Administration, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, will most certainly prevent a recurrence of the break-down of private home-financing institutions and to any former abuses in such field.

The effects of such procedure will be (1) a reduction of the present interest rate to that of the Federal Housing Administration insured mortgages, namely, 4 to $4\frac{1}{2}$ percent; (2) a more personalized servicing of these mortgages by local institutions; (3) the further modification of the mortgages by way of extension of the amortization period; (4) the elimination of the conflicts between the amortization periods of the present mortgages of the Corporation and those now being insured by the Federal Housing Administration.

These are the aims of the pending resolutions and legislation now before the House that will be of benefit to the home owners. The transferring of these securities would relieve the Government of suffering further loss as a result of the foregoing modifications and would result in a steadying of the real-estate market and a considerable decrease in the number of foreclosures with which we are now faced.

In a like manner, we owe it to ourselves to know or begin to know how and in what manner the real estate and other properties acquired by the Corporation may most quickly and profitably be disposed of. At the rate of deficit for 1938, it would not take but 10 years that the accumulated deficit of the Corporation would exceed the present value of the properties acquired. Appreciating that it is not the policy of the Corporation to dump on the market at sacrifice prices the acquired properties, it would seem to be questionable business practice to hold those properties if they might otherwise be disposed of and any necessary loss taken now.

Of the available income-producing properties owned by the Corporation, it was reported in a national statement issued by the Corporation on December 31, 1938, that 88 percent were rented and that 98.8 percent of the tenants were either current or less than 1 month in arrears in rent.

I submit that a proper, intelligent, and efficient inquiry along the lines I have suggested will undoubtedly lead to legislation designed to accomplish the following:

First. The immediate freeing of upwards of $2,000,000,000 of private capital now lying idle in banks, insurance companies, and so forth.

Second. The return of home financing to its appropriate field, to wit, private and local institutions.

Third. The termination of a purely emergency instrumentality of Government and the withdrawal of the Government from the fields of mortgage servicing and "landlord," the latter with all its unpopular connotations.

Fourth. The accruing benefits flowing to home owners and borrowers in lowered interest rates resulting from the transfer of their mortgages in a favorable "sellers" market.

Fifth. The rendering possible of more "personalized" servicing of the mortgages through local institutions which would have a more friendly attitude, with the retention of adequate safeguards for the protection of the borrowers.

Sixth. Increasing activity in the local real-estate markets resulting from the revaluation of the properties of the Corporation.

We can and should make this inquiry in order that this emergency instrumentality of the Government, having accomplished its purpose, will be terminated with the heartfelt appreciation of this body and those whose homes were saved through it. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEOGH. I yield. Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. I want to congratulate my colleague for the very clear manner in which he has presented this very involved subject. I wonder if I might make this suggestion to the gentleman: After many years in the realestate business, I have some knowledge of those problems. I think if the gentleman would invite the real-estate boards of the country and the various presidents of savings banks to sit around the table, he would be doing a great deal toward solving this problem. I think there is a great deal of merit in the gentleman's proposal. I want to say now that I will be delighted to cooperate with the gentleman in this plan.

Mr. KEOGH. I appreciate the gentleman's very kind offer of cooperation and I trust I may have the same degree of it from all Members of the House on both sides.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. I am sure you will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GAVAGAN). The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEOGH] has expired.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JUNE 8, 1939

(Legislative day of Monday, June 5, 1939)

The Senate met at 1 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, ruler and guide of the destinies of nations, our everlasting Father in whom are found the springs of all parental tenderness and grace: We thank Thee for the manifold blessings bestowed upon us as a nation; for the ideals of government, of liberty and justice, so largely inherited from the mother country to which today America pays loving tribute as she welcomes to her heart the British sovereign and his gracious queen. Preserve them in health and strength; may Thine everlasting arms encircle them, and may their happy sojourn in our midst be to us, to them, and to their people a source of blessed understanding, as together we face the problems of tomorrow in the spirit of closer friendship and of deeper consecration to our God. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR LEWIS OF ILLINOIS

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I prepared an address which I expected to deliver when the memorial addresses were made in the Senate a few days ago on the life, character, and public service of the late Senator from Illinois, Hon. James Hamilton Lewis, but on account of lack of time on that occasion did not do so. I therefore now ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Record the remarks prepared by me as a fitting tribute to the memory of the late Senator from Illinois.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, Senator James Hamilton Lewis has been for so long a time conspicuously associated with the history of the Congress and the country, and especially so very affectionately linked with our thoughts and recollections of the stirring and epochal events of the present administration that his sudden departure in the very vigor of potential achievement has awakened the deeper depths of our emotional nature. If his exit from the arena of life had been effected similar to the manner of the going down of the slowly descending sun after passing the meridian heights, sorrowing comrades and devoted loved ones could have better sustained the shock of his passing. But when a familiar star is precipitately blotted from the firmament of the famed and illustrious, then it is that we, who have been so often led by its kindly light are left to startling darkness, the envelopment of an inconsolable sorrow; then it is that rivers of grief pour into the void of our aching hearts.

It has been said that the background of a man's life plays an important part in the formation of his character. Impossible it is to know a man without knowing something of his background. The community in which he has lived, the things and people that constitute his early environment impress and shape his personality and determine his outlook on life. These essentials supply a sort of reference map for the study of individual character.

A few of the things that go to make up the partial background of James Hamilton Lewis may be properly reviewed at this moment. He was born in Virginia, the Old Dominion, and sometimes called the Mother of Presidents. He was a student in Georgia and later attended the University of Virginia and also universities in Ohio and Texas. He received honorary degrees from institutions of learning in Europe. Impelled by the spirit of adventure and romance, he migrated to the Pacific Northwest and began the practice of law in Seattle, Wash. In that State he became a member of the legislature, and Democratic Congressman at large. He served as a soldier and officer in the Spanish-American War and at the end of this service established residence and citizenship in the city of Chicago, Ill., where, after holding many places of public trust, he was chosen United States Senator to represent the people of that great western Commonwealth.

Such, in brief, is the educational, political, and geographical background of James Hamilton Lewis. Forthrightly will it be observed that it is impossible for a man so environed to become stalemated by the drowsy atmosphere of provincialism. His was a background that extended from coast to coast, from north to south, and covered an experience in the affairs of men bounded only by the height of their joys and the depth of their sorrows; and thus it came to be that his courtly air and gentlemanly graces, his social sympathies, and love of country were not of a province but of a continent—all in all, in him was personified the ideal citizen of the United States of America—scholar, soldier, statesman, and patriot.

I recall having read many years ago an article in Collier's Weekly representing an interview of a columnist of that paper with Hon. James Hamilton Lewis. Among other things the writer asked Mr. Lewis, "Since you have run for office frequently and have never experienced defeat but once, to what secret do you attribute this remarkable success?" Mr. Lewis replied: "If there be any secret associated with, or responsible for, this success, it is in knowing when to run." Just so often as Senator Lewis has come to my desk during a heated discussion of some highly controversial subject and, bending low over my shoulder, would whisper into my ear, "Now is the time to strike," just so many times have I had occasion to recall this characteristically terse explanation of his victorious candidacies.

James Hamilton Lewis believed in the propriety of things. He believed in fitting the topic to the humor of the hour, and in suiting the action and its phrasing to the psychology of the moment. His knowledge of human nature and of the peculiar mental processes of the average individual heightened his ability in discovering the eternal fitness of things and appropriately associating place and circumstance. As an illustration of that fine penetrating appreciation of timeliness in the introduction and development of some engaging theme of universal import to a listening and distracted world, I have only to use his own words spoken in a memorial address on the occasion of the death of Senator Joseph Taylor | Robinson:

It is agreeable to dwell for a second upon the scene presented in this body at this moment. I would invite the countries of the world, wherever their parliaments are assembled, to view at this moment the United States Senate, this great legislative body in this American Nation. Behold how those of opposite political faith and those of conflicting contention sit in the quietude of suffering, with suppressed tears in their hearts at the loss of their fellow legislator. Every difference of the past is quelled. Every mutiny is hushed. Nothing of the past that took on the form of party contest is reflected in the slightest suggestion, while everything of expression moves to that beautiful sympathy, that brotherhood which feels the depths of loss and suffering for its stricken. In this moment I rise to note what security there is in this scene in America. What a beautiful example is exhibited of the support and sustenance of all that could be called for in government. I merely invite the attention of the world to what this body now represents in its expressions as to America.

What more outstandingly engaging theme at that moment than national security; what more solemn and impressive Jesson evoked from that theme, and what more befitting time and place could have been chosen to give wings to an accurate and dependable concept of our national security that it might be wafted to a Nation mourning at the bier of a beloved son, and to the uttermost peoples of the earth.

I recall no lines in the literature of our language that more perfectly describe, or adequately portray, the colorful and eventful life of James Hamilton Lewis than those employed by John Temple Graves in his memorial address on the life and achievements of Henry Woodfry Grady, who, like Senator Lewis, died literally loving a Nation into peace and security. I refer to those finely turned phrases of matchless imagery, "inimitable by model or by pencil drawn," wherein he said:

I have seen at midnight the gleaming headlight of a giant locomotive, rushing onward through the darkness, heedless of danger and uncertainty, and I have thought the spectacle grand. I have seen the light come over the eastern hills in glory, driving the lazy darkness, like mist before a seaborn gale, till leaf and tree and blade of grass sparkled as myriad diamonds in the morning rays, and I have thought that it was grand. I have seen the lightning leap at midnight athwart the storm-swept sky, shivering over chaotic clouds, mid howling winds, till cloud and darkness and the shadow-haunted earth flashed into midday splendor, and I have known that it was grand. But the grandest thing, next to the radiance that flows from the Almighty's throne, is the light of a noble and beautiful life, shining in benediction upon the destinies of men, and finding its home in the bosom of the everlasting God.

The life of James Hamilton Lewis, who has ever been a star of the first magnitude in the political firmament of our day, represents just such a light as was apotheosized by the gifted Georgian—a light of such glowing effulgence as that it radiated an enveloping benediction around the great body of lawmakers to which he belonged, and to which he made distinguished contribution. When he spoke in the Halls of Congress, it seemed that all the rare and luminous words of poetic phrase and polished diction that had ever blossomed in the shining pathway of an inspired pen, prostrated themselves in loving obedience to their master's will. He combined the inextinguishable glow of a noble sentiment, and the magic power of a burning thought, with the resonant rhythm and deep diapason of a voice of melody.

In this age of sordid and selfish commercialism, he strove to turn its plethora of gains into paths of peace, and the outstretched palms of poverty; into the ways of righteousness and the road to recovery and relief. In these disjointed times when those who have, are arrayed against those who have not, he sought an adjustment and reconciliation through the invincible logic of liberalism. He asked no safer shield, or more redoubtable armor with which to wage successful war upon economic depression than the imperishable principles and policies of the New Deal. Under that flag—beneath that banner, he marched with stately step and chivalric pride abreast with his worthy comrades, and in it all, through storm and strife and show of terrific combat, never a shaft he shot with unerring aim—never a lance he lifted to stay the gathering onslaught—except it were "tipped with a rose."

James Hamilton Lewis was an orator in the true sense of that word. As a political speaker on the hustings; as a formidable debater in the forum; as the people's advocate in LXXXIV—431 the United States Senate; everywhere, in the free, open tilt and tournament of intellectual prowess, he displayed rare and exceptional qualities. It would be difficult indeed to enumerate all of the elements that characterized and adorned his style of expression, such as natural grace and persuasive force, polished behavior, and penetrating scholarship, impeccable politeness, and compelling logic. Cicero, after enumerating all the qualities that should be possessed by the perfect orator, concluded by saying:

To these qualities are to be blended refined beauty of language and deliberate courtesy of manner.

If the great Roman citizen had lived in this age and had spoken these words in our time, I do not doubt but that one would have thought he had none other in mind than James Hamilton Lewis, for in all my acquaintance with and knowledge of public men in contemporary life, not one possessed these blending qualities in the degree and charm they were so distinctly and impressively exemplified in the discourses and public utterances of James Hamilton Lewis.

The last illness of Senator Lewis overtook him while returning to Washington from a brief and long-coveted visit to his beloved Chicago. He had begun this returning journey filled with the buoyant hope and high expectation of reassuming his duties here in the Senate, but immediately on arriving at the Capital City, because of a serious heart attack in transit, he deemed it best that he should be taken forthwith to a hospital for treatment. Upon arriving at this institution, it is said he chanced to meet and recognize at the doorway an old friend of long acquaintance, and, although experiencing at the moment the most excruciating pain, he turned aside to address this humble citizen in his charming and customarily courteous manner. James Hamilton Lewis, who had shown us in life how a citizen should live, taught us in his last hour how a gentleman should die.

DESECRATION AND MUTILATION OF THE AMERICAN FLAG

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, this week has been designated Flag Week. Naturally, this being the case, it arouses particularly our attention to the integrity and dignity of our flag. I was astonished to see a picture appearing in a newspaper a few days ago which indicated that at a public meeting in a certain part of this country a certain organization had pictures of its heroes in a foreign country around the walls and beneath the chair of the obvious leader of this group was a crumpled American flag. Whether or not that picture is authentic, I do not know, but, in looking into the statutes to see whether or not there was provision against the desecration and mutilation of the American flag, I found no statutory provision on that subject save in the District of Columbia. I thought it appropriate, at least, that we might consider the question of the preservation of the American flag against desecration and mutilation by those who do not respect the institutions or the dignity of the American Commonwealth. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill on that subject which I send to the desk and ask for its appropriate reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill of the Senator from Florida will be received and properly referred.

The bill (S. 2582) to prevent and punish the desecration, mutilation, or improper use of the flag of the United States of America was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL MEETING FOR MORAL REARMAMENT (S. DOC. NO. 82)

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, on Sunday, June 4, there was held in Constitution Hall, Washington, the National Meeting for Moral Rearmament. I had the honor at that time to present the following message from the President of the United States, which opened that great assembly:

The underlying strength of the world must consist in the moral fiber of her citizens. A program of moral rearmament for the world cannot fail, therefore, to lessen the danger of armed conflict. Such moral rearmament, to be most highly effective, must receive support on a world-wide basis.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

That meeting was sponsored by members of the Cabinet and Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the invitation to the meeting contained messages from the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Attorney General, the Speaker of the House, the leader of the Senate majority, former President Hoover, the Senator from Kansas

[Mr. Capper], the Senator from New York [Mr. Wagner], Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr., the minority leader in the House of Representatives, Dr. Alexis Carrel. There was also one from John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United States in the last war, which I wish to read:

This moral rearmament should enlist the support of all thinking people. There is a spiritual emotion which underlies all true patriotism, and good citizenship itself is dependent upon the high sense of moral obligation of the people. Today, confronted by conditions so threatening to world peace, we must rededicate ourselves to the faith of our forefathers if we are to be worthy of

JOHN J. PERSHING.

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, founder of the Oxford Group. There were messages from the House of Lords of Great Britain signed by 25 members of that body, and a message from the House of Commons signed by 236 members of that body. Messages also came from the Netherlands, from the Union of South Africa, from British labor, and from great diplomats the world over.

I think it is particularly appropriate, Mr. President, to record these messages from Great Britain in the proceedings of the Senate today because of the presence here of the King and Queen of Great Britain, and because of the fact that included among the signatories are men who both personally and officially are associated with Their Majesties.

I ask that this document be printed in the body of the RECORD and that its printing as a Senate document be authorized (Senate Document No. 82).

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed as a Senate document and to be published in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, on Sunday evening, June 4, there was held in Constitution Hall, Washington, a National Meeting for Moral Re-Armament. I had the honor at that time to present the following message from the President of the United States, which opened that

A program of moral rearmament for the world cannot fail, therefore, to lessen the danger of armed conflict. Such moral rearmament, to be most highly effective, must receive support on a world-wide basis.

"Franklin D. Roosevelt."

From former President Herbert Hoover:

"The world has come out of confusion before because some men and women stood solid. They held safety for the world, not be-cause they knew the solutions to all these confusions, not because cause they knew the solutions to all these confusions, not because they even had the power to find solutions. They stood firm and they held the light of civilization until the furies passed because they individually held to certain principles of life, of morals, and spiritual values. These are the simple concepts of truth, justice, tolerance, mercy, and respect for the dignity of the common man. To hold and lift these banners in the world will go far to solve its confusions.

"What the world needs today is to return to sanity and to moral and spiritual ideals. At the present time nothing so concerns the progress of mankind.

"HERBERT HOOVER."

Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate

Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate the various messages which have been received from all parts of the country endorsing the present campaign for moral rearmament. Among them are the following:

From the Secretary of State:

"Here in the post-war period there has been a general lowering of standards of conduct—moral, political, social, and economic. International morality has seldom been at a lower ebb. The time is ripe and the need is urgent for a renewal and restoration of the former high standard of conduct of both individuals and governments. "CORDELL HULL."

From the Secretary of War:

"The heart of national defense is a rebirth of true patriotism among our people. Moral rearmament deepens and strengthens that love of country without which no nation is secure, and it deserves the support of every loyal American.

"Happy H. Woodring." "HARRY H. WOODRING."

From the Attorney General:

"As a practical Catholic, I believe that our hope lies in a rebirth of the old integrities and a new sense of moral values. This tragic twentieth century, when faith seems in eclipse, may yet prove the most glorious in history because out of the weakness of our broken hopes is rising the strong tide of a spiritual awakening. Moral rearmament is safeguarding the great traditions of our past, and will provide the sinews of our might for the future.

From the Speaker of the House of Representatives:
"At a time when major calamity threatens the world, no greater blessing could come to our land than a reawakening to those ancient truths on which the strength of democracy is built. Therefore must be a new spirit at home, as well as abroad. We, therefore, join in welcoming the movement for moral and spiritual rearmament as a bulwark of the democratic tradition and a basis for unity throughout the Nation.

"WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD."

From the majority leader of the Senate:
"One of the chief hopes for civilization is to strengthen and unite the moral forces of mankind. Our generation must rearm morally or suffer from moral and spiritual disorganization. Common action in this high endeavor would unite the conflicting elements within our own democracy, and enable America to give a leadership which could save the world.

"ALBEN W. BARKLEY."

From John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United

"This moral rearmament should enlist the support of all thinking people. "JOHN J. PERSHING."

From the senior Senator from Kansas: "Faith in God, love of the land, and a pioneer spirit once con-quered a continent. Sons of the West will fight for moral re-armament as the next frontier movement in American history, and make the same sacrifices to carry it from coast to coast.

"ARTHUR CAPPER."

From the senior Senator from New York:

"The great need of the hour is for a spirit of moral rearmament in every phase of national life. Inspired by such a spirit, labor and industry can take their rightful place of service in the public interest and demonstrate to the world that unity in which alone lies liberty and peace. "ROBERT F. WAGNER."

From the minority leader of the House of Representatives:
"No greater contribution to the America of tomorrow could be rendered than the moral rearmament of the American people. would create an unselfishness which is most essential if we are to solve properly the great problems which today confront the Nation. Most of our troubles and difficulties can be traced to the selfishness of minorities. Moral rearmament is a great need of the day.

"Joseph W. Martin, Jr."

From the Governor of the State of New York:
"In these critical times our people must face the future with a patriotism above partisanship. We must develop a moral consciousness based on a faith in God which can inspire both public and private life.

"A program of this nature can bring an answer to the problems of our day and deserves the fullest cooperation of all true Americans. "HERBERT H. LEHMAN."

From the mayor of the city of New York:

"I wish you well-deserved success for Moral Rearmament Meeting. A new determination has come to the life of this city as a result of the desire for moral rearmament, for more honest and unselfish relations, a greater readiness to work together for the common good without party prejudices, and a truer faith in the God of us all.

"America has taken her rightful place in the leadership of the world. We therefore must make sure that our own house is in order first. I hope that New York may take the lead in this task and become the sounding board to the nation for moral rearmament.

"I'F H LaGUARDIA."

"F. H. LAGUARDIA."

From Dr. Alexis Carrel, of the Rockefeller Institute:

From Dr. Alexis Carrel, of the Rockefeller Institute:

"The spiritual activities of man are no less real than physical and chemical phenomena—and their importance is much greater. The emancipation from the dogma of materialism will usher in an era when human life will be broader and more complete.

"Civilization today stands at the crossroads. We speak of peace. But we must not forget that life loves the strong; that peace demands strength. The strength of nations, like that of man, is composed of spiritual as well as material elements. Therefore the call of the hour must be a call to moral and physical virility. And the spiritual rearming of men and nations must lead the way.

"ALEXIS CARREL."

Mr. President, the principal address of the evening was given by Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, founder of the Oxford Group, and I will

Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, founder of the Oxford Group, and I will quote from it as follows:

"MRA is the triumph of a God-given thought. It came as the answer to a crisis that threatened civilization. A reemphasis of old truths was let loose in the world—simple homespun truths that have been the backbone of the real America, the guidance of God, and a change of heart. Everyone agreed that these great truths had to be recaptured, relived, and restored to authority—truths which, were they practiced, would bring the answer. The phrase that riveted itself upon the attention of men everywhere was 'Moral and spiritual rearmament.' and spiritual rearmament.'

"Leadership of the future goes to the men of moral courage; the men who ask and give 3 feet to the yard, 16 ounces to the pound. As Americans, as patriots, we find that MRA is the common denomias americans, as patriots, we find that MRA is the common denominator on which everyone can unite. In an age of material perfection we must usher in the age of spiritual force, when spiritual power becomes the greatest power in the world. The voice of God must become the voice of the people; the will of God the will of the people. "America may not have been moving from crists to crisis, but America is not without her problems in business, the home, in industry, in civic and in Government life.

"We need a reladication of our people to the common that it is the common to the common that it is the common to the common that it is the America is not without her problems in business, the home, in industry, in civic and in Government life.

"We need a rededication of our people to those elementary virtues of honesty, unselfishness, and love. We must have the will again to find what unites people rather than what divides them. It must become the dawn of a new era, a new age, a new civilization. "By a miracle of science men can speak by radio to millions. By a miracle of the spirit God can speak to every man. His voice can be heard in every home, every business, every government. When man listens, God speaks. When man obeys, God acts. It does not matter who you are or where you are. Accurate, adequate information can come from the mind of God to the minds of men who are willing to take their orders from Him. This is the revolution which will change human nature and remake men and nations. "People believe that their leaders should be guided by God. But the rank and file must be guided, too. A God-guided public opinion is the strength of the leaders. This is the dictatorship of the living spirit of God, which gives every man the inner discipline he needs and the inner liberty he desires. This is the true democracy. "Our security, the world's security, lies in God-control. No other social, political, or economic program goes to the root of the disease in human nature. Only God-controlled men will make God-controlled nations to make a new world. In this adventure every man can find his vocation, every nation its destiny.

"The future depends not on what a few men may decide to do in Europe, but upon what a million men decide to be in America, under the dominion of God, has the historic opportunity of leading the nations into the spacious freedom of a world at peace within itself."

of leading the nations into the spacious freedom of a world at peace within itself."

Mr. President, I respectfully request permission to insert in the RECORD at this time a few of the many striking messages received by the sponsors from all over the world endorsing this great movement.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT OF 1937

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 591) to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, when the Senate began the consideration of the bill now pending I sent to the desk a letter from President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, speaking for a membership of some 5.000,-000 American workmen, endorsing completely the measure.

I now send to the desk a letter which I have received from John L. Lewis, president of the Congress of Industrial Organizations. I ask that the letter from Mr. Lewis be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the letter, as follows:

CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS, Washington, D. C., June 7, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: I understand that the Senate is now considering S. 591, introduced by you, which increases the authorization to borrow on the part of the United States Housing Authority an additional $800,000,000 and appropriates $45,000,000 for grants and subsidies.

grants and subsidies.

The Congress of Industrial Organizations is wholeheartedly in favor of such increased authorization and appropriation. The country has come to appreciate the importance of a Nation-wide public housing program. The need for adequate housing has received universal recognition. In addition to taking care of the needs of thousands of people, additional employment is provided which is of such great importance at the present time.

The Congress of Industrial Organizations has merely one complaint in regard to 8, 591 namely that the authorization for in-plaint in regard to S. 591, namely, that the authorization for increased borrowing and appropriation falls far short of the needs of this country. Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. LEWIS. President.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the other day, when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Typings] was discussing this legislation he made the statement—I am sure inadvertently that the Federal Administrator was permitting localities in most cases to make up 10 percent of the construction cost of the projects under its jurisdiction, simply by the allowance of tax exemption.

I stated at the time that I was sure the Senator was incorrect and that the law did not permit any such allowances, but that the 10 percent had to be put up by the locality in cash. The Senator then stated, I think-his recollection is better than mine-that if that was so the Administrator had violated the law.

In view of the controversy, I think it is fair to the Administrator that I have read from the desk a letter which he sent to me in relation to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to having the letter read? The Chair hears none, and the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, UNITED STATES HOUSING AUTHORITY, Washington.

My Dear Senator Wagner: I have received your inquiry concerning a statement made by Senator Tydings on the Senate floor on June 6 to the effect that the 10 percent of the development cost of a low-rent housing project, which is supposed to be raised locally, is covered by tax exemptions. Upon examination of the Record, page 6670, I find that Senator Tyding: said: "The 10 percent is interpreted merely as remission of taxes. * * * The municipalities * * * simply agree that they will waive certain taxes on these houses in the future, and that is a violation of the 10-percent clause. * * * Mr. Keyserling himself in my office told me that they were taking this 10 percent in the form of a waiver of taxes."

of a waiver of taxes."

This statement is entirely incorrect. The 10 percent of the development cost of a low-rent housing project that is required to be raised locally cannot be covered in any way by tax exemptions under the United States Housing Act. It therefore goes without saying that no arrangements have ever been made or contemplated to cover this 10 percent in any way by tax exemptions for any project ever assisted by the United States Housing Authority. Furthermore, it would be physically impossible to cover this 10 percent by tax exemptions. Under the act the United States Housing Authority can lend not more than 90 percent of the development cost of a project. It is obvious that the other 10 percent must come in cash from local sources before the project can be completed, and that future tax exemption cannot pay contractors to complete a project. contractors to complete a project.

contractors to complete a project.

There are no subsidies or capital grants in the development or construction costs of U. S. H. A. assisted projects. The projects are financed entirely by loans, 90 percent of the construction loans being borrowed by the local housing authority from the Federal Government and 10 percent of the construction loans being borrowed by the local housing authority from sources other than the Federal Government, whether they be public sources or private sources. The loans borrowed from the Federal Government are repaid in full, principal and interest, by the local authority; and the loans borrowed from sources other than the Federal Government are repaid in full, principal and interest, by the local housing authority housing authority

All the Federal and local subsidies or annual contributions to reduce rents are paid strictly on an annual basis after the projects have been completed. These annual subsidies are paid by the reduce rents are paid strictly on an annual basis after the projects have been completed. These annual subsidies are paid by the Federal Government in cash, and are paid by the localities in one or several of the forms permitted by the act, namely, "cash or tax remissions, general or special, or tax exemptions" (sec. 10 (a)). remissions, general or special, or tax exemptions' (sec. 10 (a)).

In practice, the localities have furnished their local annual contributions largely in the form of tax exemptions. On the average, the local annual contributions or subsidies are running about 50 percent of the Federal annual contributions or subsidies.

I would not deem it necessary to write you assuring you that we are following the letter and the spirit of the United States Housing as the results of the letter and the spirit of the United States Housing.

Act, with which you are so familiar, had you not called to my attention the statement made yesterday to the effect that we were doing something which, under the statute, we have no right to do.

Faithfully yours,

NATHAN STRAUS. Administrator.

Hon. Robert F. Wagner, United States Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the statement which I made, quoting Mr. Keyserling, the assistant to Mr. Straus, was an accurate statement. However, I believe Mr. Keyserling at the time thought I had directed my question to the rent subsidy. In quoting him, I quoted him verbatim. I believe he had in mind something foreign to the question I addressed to him, and that probably is the reason for my misunderstanding of the practice of the United States Housing Authority.

Commenting on the letter which Mr. Straus has sent, however, let me say that the letter leaves the listener under a false impression. While it is accurate, nevertheless the inference which it conveys is not accurate; for Mr. Straus says that the loans of 90 percent which the United States Housing Authority makes to the local authorities are repaid, principal and interest, by the local authorities to the national authority. That is a correct statement; but what Mr. Straus did not say is that the Federal Government gives to the local authorities each year the money with which to pay the principal and the interest of the 90-percent loans. So, in the end-and I do not think the Senator from New York will take issue with this statement—the Federal Government makes a contract to give to the local authority each year what the local authority is required to pay to the national Authority to liquidate the principal and interest on the loan originally made; not only that much, but it gives the local authority more than enough to liquidate the local authority's loan to the United States Housing Authority in Washington.

Therefore, as I stated the other day, in the end the United States Housing Authority is giving 90 percent of the cost of each and every one of these projects to the municipality or its agency, free of any cost whatever to the municipality or its agency. It is true that when the local authority comes to Washington and gets 90 percent of the development cost of a project, it agrees to pay that 90 percent back to the Federal Authority over a period of 60 years; but in the same contract the United States Housing Authority agrees to give to the local authority, each year for 60 years, a sum of money more than sufficient to pay the principal and the yearly interest on the 90-percent loan originally made; and the fact stands out in clear relief that the United States Housing Authority is giving to the cities and towns of America more than 90 percent of the entire cost of constructing every slum-project building from one end of the country to the other.

In my opinion, when the Federal Government goes into the business of providing homes for the people of America, it is going far out of its national field. It is going into the field of local responsibility, and is taking from the locality almost in its entirety supervision over the housing of the people of the Nation, a matter formerly under the supervision of the locality itself.

It is my thought that the Housing Act ought to be revised. It is my thought that the localities—the cities, the towns, and the States—ought to have a wider share in the solution of this problem. Today the Federal Government is paying more than 90 percent of the entire cost of tearing down the old buildings and putting up the new buildings; and I do not think that is a very good approach to the solution of this problem.

Mark you, Mr. President, the annual contributions which the Federal Government makes to the local authority are called subsidies, but the local authority uses the money to pay off the loan which it owes to the national authority. I cannot see any reason for sending money to Chicago or to Baltimore or to New York in one mail, having the check deposited, and then having the local authority write out a new check for the same amount and send it back to the local authority and say, "Pay this amount on our loan as this year's contribution." In other words, the local authority receives from Washington, each year, a check, and sends the amount of the check back to Washington to pay off that year's amortization and interest.

I know that what I have to say here is not going to change any votes. I do not believe many Senators are familiar with this act in its ramifications. It certainly is administered differently from what I conceived to be its general explanation at the time it was passed. In my judgment, within 3 or 4 years from now this will be another Greenbelt proposition; and then speeches will be made in this body by the very Senators who now, with a little care, could change the policy so as to prevent such a situation from arising.

I put in the RECORD the other day a chart drawn by the survey department of this agency. The chart showed that persons earning $2,500 a year were occupying some of the projects built by the Federal Government before the United States Housing Authority was created.

I put in the RECORD charts showing that families making $2,000 a year, $2,200 a year, $1,800 a year, $2,500 a year, were living in these Government-constructed houses, when they are supposed to be built for the very poor, the lowest-income groups of the Nation.

If we take the financial break-down of these houses, in my judgment we will find it is not going to be possible for the people for whom they are built to live in them unless they get money from relief appropriations in order to pay a part of the rent. The whole scheme is so visionary, so unreal, and so detached from local responsibility, that in the end it is going to be revised. At least my remarks may have the effect of hastening the day, and may save Government some hundreds of millions, a mere drop in the bucket, to be sure, but I shall be grateful if I can contribute a little toward saving a portion of the billion, six hundred million dollars, which is the total which will be authorized by the pending measure and the previous acts.

If we are to rehabilitate the underhoused third of this Nation, the 8,000,000 families about whom the Chief Executive and others high in authority in this administration talk, and if we are to rehabilitate them at a cost of $5,000 a family, it will require $40,000,000,000. It is not possible to get away from the fact that eight million times $5,000 is $40,000,000,000; and that is about the size of the national debt now.

Further than that, Congress will be committed each year, by contract, to appropriate for the benefit of these local housing authorities an amount sufficient to enable them to pay off the entire $40,000,000,000, if the program goes that far.

These houses are not being built by the States or the cities or the towns of America; they are being built by the national Treasury. Let me bring up a point in connection with that. If one picks up a financial statement of the Government at no place will he find that a single dollar being spent for the United States Housing Authority is charged as a part of the national debt. This is the way they get around that. The United States Housing Authority gives its notes to the Federal Treasury, the Federal Treasury sells the notes and hands the money back to the Housing Authority, and the Housing Authority lends the money to the cities. Yet the Federal Government owes every dollar of that money, because in every one of these contracts there is a provision that the Congress shall annually appropriate for the cities an amount of money sufficient to enable them to repay the loans. Consequently, if we did not make these annual contributions the notes would be in default, and there would be a direct charge on the Federal Treasury to make them good. So, on the enactment of the pending measure, we will in effect be committed, as a matter of bookkeeping and of fact, to a national debt of a billion six hundred million dollars, in addition to all the other debts which the Federal Government owes. Yet if one picked up a financial statement of the Government he would not think the Federal Government had a cent of liability in this matter, when it is liable for every single, solitary cent of this appropriation, because, as I repeat, the loan is to be paid off by annual appropriations of so much money by the Congress of the United States.

If I recall rightly, this $1,600,000,000 authorization will mean an annual charge on the Treasury of about $45,000,000 a year. Every time the amount is increased, it means an added annual charge for 60 years. So that when we increase the amount of the loan, we commit the Congresses which are to come to pay each year a definite sum of money to liquidate the debt.

No one is disputing the statement that the cities of the country are putting up practically nothing toward the development costs of these buildings; no one disputes the statement that the Federal Government annually is putting up sufficient money to liquidate the entire loan; that the Congress, not the local authority, each year is paying off these loans we are authorizing to be created, because the Congress appropriates a sum of money for the local authority, which the local authority immediately sends back to the National Authority to pay off the bill. Without the annual appropriations, which are guaranteed in these contracts, there would not be any repayment of the loans at all. The Congress is committed to appropriate each year a sufficient amount to wipe out the entire $1,600,000,000 with interest in 60 years without any contribution at all from the cities, the towns, or the States of the United States.

Mr. President, I have tried to explain the matter in my way, and I hope I have explained it accurately. I was in error in one statement yesterday—that the 10 percent was in the form of waived taxes and was not in cash. Mr. Keyserling told me that it was, and I could not see how that could be done under the law. What Mr. Keyserling meant was that that was a subsidy given by the cities to the particular project to bring down the rents. But that has nothing to do with the repayment of the loans of the local authorities to the National Government.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator understands, I assume, that these subsidy payments are not only sufficient to pay the 90 percent which is loaned by the Federal Government, but also sufficient to pay the sinking fund and the 10 percent which is borrowed locally from some other lender.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is absolutely correct. The Senator knows that in my remarks on Tuesday I took as an illustration a million-dollar project, and using the exact figures of the United States Housing Authority, showed that each year they sent a sufficient amount of money to the local housing authority not only to enable the Housing Authority to pay off the 90 percent which it had borrowed from the Federal Government, principal and interest, but, in addition a sum sufficient to amortize the 10 percent which the cities are required to put up in cash. I think that is the point to which the Senator from Ohio refers.

There is not a particle of doubt that every year we are by congressional appropriation giving to the local housing authority enough money to pay off, over a period of 60 years, the entire cost, principal and interest, of erecting every project in this country.

Perhaps the Senate wants that done. I do not believe it is necessary to spend $5,000 per family in order to clear up the slums of this Nation. I do not believe it is necessary in all cases to demolish the buildings which are now standing. I believe that they can be renovated; I believe they can be modernized; I believe that the facilities which might be required to raise them to what we may call a decent standard of American living can be installed in these houses. To be sure, I believe that some of them ought to come down; I believe that some of them are unfitted for renovation, but I do not believe that in every case it is necessary to tear the buildings down and erect in their places modern apartment buildings for people who are making four, five, six, seven, or eight hundred dollars a year. My common sense tells me that when they are constructed, even with the rent subsidies and the low rents, families making five, six, seven, of eight hundred dollars a year are not going to be able to pay the rent charged in such expensive buildings, and that the time will come, in the years that are ahead, when the housing authorities will be more interested in running the projects on a business basis than on a humaninterest basis. When that time comes, we will have committed the Government to these expenses of hundreds of millions of dollars without accomplishing the purpose we have in mind.

Further than that, there is no provision in the bill to take care of the poor housing conditions in the countryside. It applies only to the cities of America. I give my word that within an hour I can go from the Senate Chamber into either Virginia or Maryland, which I hope are average States, and I can show hovels in which people are living far below the standard of many of the homes which are being demolished in the cities under the Housing Act. Inasmuch as all the initial cost of this renovation is directly and indirectly being paid for by the Government of the United States, I ask why are those living in the countryside in small, insecure, and unsafe houses without modern conveniences entirely left out of the operation of the law, while all this Federal money is being poured into the larger cities of the country? Housing knows no geographic location.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I have drawn an amendment, which I propose to offer, to take care of the very situation the Senator now criticizes, namely, that under the present program the U. S. H. A. is not reaching the rural sections of the country where there are many blighted areas. The amendment is now printed. It has been discussed with the Secretary of Agriculture, as well as with the Administrator and others interested in the agricultural areas, in order that there may be developed a cooperative program between the Department of Agriculture and the Housing Administration for the purpose of dealing with rural sections somewhat differently from the way in which we are now dealing with the more congested areas of the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not seen the Senator's amendment, and, of course, the whole approach to that problem will have to be entirely different, because there is not the governmental responsibility out on a farm, or out on a little patch of land alongside of the road. But I make the point that if this program is to go forward it ought not to be confined to special groups such as are found in the larger cities of the country; but if there is a standard of living erected in this country, it ought to take care of the dilapidated houses in the country districts the same as it takes care of those in the cities.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the very purpose of this particular amendment. We have to deal somewhat differently with the farm houses than with the houses built in congested areas. The amendment provides that eventually the farmer may own his home, or rent it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have not seen the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. It has been available for several days. Mr. TYDINGS. I may say that I am talking without having had a chance to read the amendment; or, what is more, to study it. Sometimes just reading these amendments, as I have discovered from reading the United States Housing Authority Act, gives one very little information. We must dig into the mechanics of a proposal and find out its ramifications.

Mr. WAGNER. It depends on how one reads it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. For example, the United States Housing Authority Act in no place provides that the United States Housing Authority shall annually give to the locality a sum of money greater than the locality's need to pay off the loan to the United States Housing Authority. The power is simply a general power. There is no limitation placed on the amount. One reading the act would assume that there would be a very low annual payment; but when he digs into the figures, when he sees what has been done, he realizes that the United States Housing Authority is giving to the local authority not only sufficient money for the local authority to pay off in full the 90-percent loan which it owes the Government, but enough money to liquidate the 10 percent which the cities of America have to put up as a condition precedent to the loan.

My objection to the program is based primarily on the fact that the Federal Government, our Republic, which was constructed to deal with things with which the communities could not deal, is now reaching out into the field of community affairs, not in a spirit of general helpfulness, not in a spirit of match and match, not in a spirit of mutual cooperation, but, in effect, the Federal Government is taking over the cost, so to speak, of the construction of new apartment houses to replace the slums. That is my basic objection to the program.

I think the States and the cities ought to have some larger stake in the matter than they have. The problem in its essence, of course, is national in scope, just as every other thing that goes wrong with our country constitutes a national problem. But it is also a local problem, and it is more of a local problem than it is a national problem.

Therefore I am hopeful, first, that nothing will be done to appropriate more money to this agency until the entire law and the practices of the United States Housing Authority can be restudied, and the act refined and improved to meet the demands for which it was originally passed.

Secondly, if we cannot have that, I am at least hopeful that we can reduce the amount of the appropriation until we shall have had further time for study and examination.

Mr. President, in what I am saying I have no idea of defeating the slum-clearance movement; I have no idea of saying that the slum situation does not present a problem; I have no idea of throwing cold water on the whole discussion. I am trying to deal with facts and figures as they have been presented to me by the United States Housing Authority, and as I have learned them from a study of the law, in the hope that Congress will not commit itself to the further expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars until it knows exactly how the money is going to be expended, whether this is the best way we can do it, and whether or not there are improvements which can be engrafted on the present system.

When the act was originally passed it received very scant attention on the floor of the Senate. Only a few Senators to my knowledge had any profound understanding of it. I do not believe that the sponsors of the act themselves had considered all its ramifications. Now that Congress has before it the experience of the last 2 or 3 years in this activity, I ask that some action be taken short of what is proposed.

In conclusion let me say that there are practically no houses now completed as a result of the first six or eight hundred million dollars which we authorized. Contracts have been made. Some houses are under construction, but a large part of that program is not even yet under way. Why put on the line $800,000,000 more until enough of these projects are finished so we can see whether or not the program is going to be efficacious? Why go further into this program now when the original appropriations which we made have not yet been exhausted, when the work in some cases has not yet been started, when the buildings in most cases have not been completed, when today no one can tell whether or not the dreams of the authors of this act will become practical realities?

Mr. President, I say that we should move a little slowly before we commit the Treasury of the United States to another expenditure of almost $1,000,000,000 in carrying out a plan which has not as yet been tried and tested and found to fill the need.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I merely wish to add a few brief words to explain the amendments now pending before the Senate, and what it is I suggest should be done with respect to the housing policy.

The amendments now pending propose that the contribution be cut from $45,000,000 a year to $30,000,000 a year, and that the total amount authorized be cut from $800,000,000 to $400,000,000 a year. Up to date $650,000,000 has been allotted, and that is all that can be allotted of the first $300,000,000, so that if the amendment is adopted the Authority will be given for allotment after the 1st of July an additional $550,000,000. The Authority has allotted only $650,000,000 in the 18 months during which it has actually operated, and has not as yet completed a building.

The peak of construction under the former program, under the $650,000,000 allotted, will not be reached until January 1940, and then, if we pass no additional legislation, construction will continue for about 4 months at that peak. If we give the Authority an additional $550,000,000, we can go on at that rate of construction for a full year and more, from May 1940 to May 1941; in other words, if my amendment is adopted, there will not be the slightest interference with the work; in fact, we will give people more work.

The question of providing work in this emergency does not really arise, because it takes at least a year before any of these projects can be started. If the pending measure is passed, it will take approximately 2 years to spend the money; so if my amendment is adopted, we will not interfere with the progress of the work in any way.

The purpose of my second amendment is to create a joint committee to investigate the activities of the Federal Government in the field of housing, particularly as administered by the United States Housing Authority, the Federal Housing Administration, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and other agencies of a temporary or emergency character. It should have ample time in which to do its work, and time to suggest a unified policy instead of a three-pronged policy in which one division has no relation to another division, so that 1 year from now, after the committee shall have made its report, we can decide whether we want to go on with this program, whether there is some cheaper way to do it, whether we have to subsidize the construction, and whether we should extend the program to rural housing. The need for the establishment of such a committee is I think emphasized, if anything, by the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. Wagner] with respect to rural housing.

Let me read a portion of the Senator's amendment. It is an amendment with respect to rural housing, substantially affecting the whole subject of how we are to handle the question of rural housing. It was never presented to the Committee on Education and Labor. We did not hear of it until yesterday. I am, however, ready to vote for it.

The Authority is hereby authorized and directed to develop and undertake a comprehensive program to assist public housing agencies in the development and administration of projects for farm families of low income in rural areas.

Does that mean an apartment house in a rural area, or does it mean individual homes, or what does it mean? I do not have the slightest idea.

To make long-term leases or purchase agreements or otherwise to rent or sell rural housing to farmers.

Is the Government going to own farm houses all over the United States and rent individual farm houses to farmers; and if so, is it going to own the farms and rent them to farmers? I do not know.

I am willing to vote for the amendment, but it emphasizes the fact that we do not know what our farm policy is, and we should go slow on this part of it, which is by far the most expensive part of it, and we ought to create a committee to investigate the entire subject. That, Mr. President, is the purpose of the amendment.

I hope very much that the Senate may see fit to adopt the two amendments I have offered, which provide that we shall proceed at the present rate for another year, and in the meantime create a committee to investigate the whole problem of housing.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. I desire to speak briefly on this subject. First of all, I think we should distinguish the undertakings of the Federal Government in the housing field between what was originally undertaken by the agency located in the Department of the Interior during the early days of the emergency or depression and that which is being carried on under the housing law of the last session. I have nothing but words of condemnation and criticism of the method in which money was spent by the Department of the Interior through the then Housing Authority in building houses, not for the poor but the middle class. Even the claim that it would provide work for craftsmen who were then unemployed does not justify this. They could and should have been slum-clearance projects solely. We know the result of that experience. Such a program is nothing more nor less than State socialism. It is nothing more nor less than Government in competition with the smallhome owners of the country.

In Washington, D. C., there is such a Federal housing development on Benning Road for colored people. When the Government found it could not receive sufficient income even to pay the interest on its investment in the earlier home-project undertakings we passed a law permitting the rental to be fixed on a basis 40 percent less than the investment cost. Even with that rental fixed there is not a colored family in that housing project which does not have to show an income of at least $100 a month. In the barber shop this morning one of the colored barbers informed me casually that a friend of his showed an income of $17 a week, and he could not obtain a tenement in this development. The same situation prevailed in all these earlier Federal housing projects.

What does that mean? It means that those who have political favor or influence, or who can pull sufficient strings and pay the rent, are occupying homes under a Government subsidy, to the disadvantage of every other man, woman, and child. If that be the policy of the Government, then every man, woman, and child has a right to occupy a Federal paid-for home on the same basis, which means State socialism and the ultimate destruction of private ownership of property. The head of one of the colored families in the section to which I referred is a school teacher receiving $2,200 a year. Such people with comparatively large incomes are housed with Government subsidies in all the earlier housing projects. I have seen the same situation in other cities with beautiful, attractive, comfortable homes which have no justification unless all our citizens are given the same benefits. In my opinion such things are indefensible. I repeat it is the beginning of the end of private ownership of homes.

At the outset I took the position, and I now take the position, that slum clearance, and slum clearance alone, is a legitimate, justifiable, and humane undertaking on the part of our Government. I supported and defended the bill of the last session, with the hope and expectation that the act would be administered with the sole objective of slum clearance in view. Again and again I have combatted those who talked about homes for low-income groups. There is a slum group in contradistinction to the low-income group. If the low-income group means those with incomes of $800 or $1,000 a year, then every man and woman who toils in the factory town where I live and where you live is in the low-income group; and yet many of them, through thrift and industry over the years, have built homes and provided comfortable surroundings for themselves and their children.

I am opposed to going into the business of building homes for low-income groups, because such a program means homes for millions, which would swamp the Public Treasury. I am not now talking about loans at low rates of interest to the low-income group to help them build homes.

When this subject was first taken up it was estimated that an investment of $60,000,000,000 would be required to remove the slums in this country, and $15,000,000,000 in the city of New York alone. Think what the cost will be if we go beyond the slum-clearance idea.

I am strongly and sincerely devoted to the poor men and women who live in slums. I want to see them taken cut of the slums and given a home and a rent subsidy. I intend to vote for the bill, but I give warning that if the program which is now being carried out and is not completed—it is unfortunate because of the short time that we have not some definite results from the money already spent—the whole undertaking will be blown out of Congress in a whirlwind of opposition if the people of the country come to realize that slum clearance means homes for low-income groups of a limited number who have a sufficient pull locally to become favored tenants.

There is not a Senator who would not vote the money to provide a home to a real slum dweller or to the washerwoman with a family of young children, who goes out and toils nights in a big office building in one of our cities. There is not a Senator who would not give a home to a man who is crippled and injured from carrying the burdens of industry and who is left without an income for the support of his wife and children. That is slum clearance. Those are the people to whom I want to give this money. I am for subsidies first and foremost to the lowest-income class. I hope and pray that the present activities of the Federal Government are moving in that direction, but if they are not the consequences will fall very heavily upon those who undertake to impede a proper development of a real slum-clearance program.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the unsatisfactory situation under the present act, in view of the fact that no houses have been completed, and in view of the fact that the evidences which have thus far been adduced indicate that the houses are not for people from the slums but for the low-income groups, does not the Senator believe we ought to postpone consideration of the bill until the next session of Congress? We have already appropriated $800,000,000. Commitments have been made to the extent of $650,000,000. There is still $150,000,000 subject to commitment. In view of the fact that no houses have yet been built, why would it not be wise to pretermit any further discussion of the bill and wait until we see the effects of the present law?

Mr. WALSH. The question which the Senator has propounded has troubled me. I should much prefer to face the issue after a demonstration of what had been done under the recent act. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] is a member of the subcommittee. He presented his views to our committee as he expressed them on the floor. He has been devotedly interested in trying to find a safe solution of the problem. He knows how I feel. I am so keenly and sincerely and deeply interested in eliminating slums that I am willing to take another chance; but it is the last chance.

In many States there are statutes which permit a city government to designate a particular area as a slum area and tear down the buildings without paying a cent of money. A real slum is an open sore. It is a breeder of disease. It contaminates the whole public health. Slum clearance is more important than education. It is more important than any other governmental activity. The first function of government is the preservation and protection of health, maintaining physical beings who are capable of earning a livelihood and defending their country. As I view it, education is second in importance. Third in importance is providing opportunities for employment.

So we are dealing with a primary question, a very simple question, and a very human question, the question of eliminating slums in distinction from mere housing building with the taxpayer's money and giving rent subsidies in

I do not mean what I have said to be taken as criticism. I have an open mind. I do not share the view of the Senator that the undertakings to date have indicated that what I hope and expect will not be realized.

We want plain, simple homes for the people who live in slums. Have we not learned anything from Europe? They are really clearing up their slums.

I think I am expressing the President's own view. He desires, hopes, and expects that simple, clean, plain, solid, substantial homes would be built for those people, homes that are above what they now have, and yet not beyond the home of the man or woman who toils, sacrifices, and labors to provide a home for his family.

There is danger of actually going into competition with the poor workingmen and women who own homes or who aspire to own homes. If we are not careful, we shall destroy all initiative in our people to provide homes for themselves. However, when we come to the question of real, disease-breeding slums, we have a primary duty and obligation, because if disease comes out of the slums, slum clearance is a benefit not only to the slum dwellers themselves but to the people who live about them and to the whole community.

While I am on my feet, I wish to say a few more words of another aspect of slum clearance. We-I mean we public servants-are largely responsible for the slum conditions of the country. Slums are largely due to a lack of education. I do not mean education in schools. They are largely due to a failure to insist upon the enforcement of the sanitary laws of cities and towns. If the officials had gone into the homes that have become so dilapidated and neglected and warned their occupants that they were creating a public nuisance, and had insisted upon the proper observance of laws on sanitation during the years that have passed, a period when a large number of recent immigrants came into this country, we would not now, in my opinion, be confronted with this problem in the proportions which it has assumed today. Unless we take action now, unless we see to it particularly that sanitary arrangements are provided and insisted upon we shall be called upon to repeat from year to year large expenditures to try to solve this problem.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer than I had intended. I feel so sincerely and so deeply on the question of slum clearance that I would consider, if I had done nothing else during the years of my public service than to have had a part and a share in promoting the welfare of humanity by improving the housing conditions of the people of the Nation and wiping out the slums, I would have performed a worth-while service. On the other hand, I think I could do real injury to the people of the country if the money appropriated for slum clearance should be diverted into competition with the owners of private property and in destroying the initiative of those who own property and who desire to occupy and rent their

I am waiving all doubt; I am taking the liberty of hoping that this desirable work will go ahead; but let me say here that if a bill on this subject again comes before the Senate, if I am in this Chamber, no one will more bitterly denounce, more severely condemn it than will I, unless I find in the homes in the large cities God's poor, the suffering men and women who really need aid, the lowest class—not merely the low-income group, which means nearly everybody, but the lowest income group; and there is a great distinction.

So, Mr. President, these are my views.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President— Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If my recollection serves me aright, the President of the United States, on the Capitol steps, stated that one-third of the Nation was "ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed." That is quite a large number, and I am very much interested in the statement of the able Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Someone has said that every man and woman who toils ought to receive an income sufficient to give him and his family the frugal comforts of life-"frugal" is a good word-"the frugal comforts of life." I think the President in making that statement had in mind that one-third did not possess the "frugal comforts of life." I do not think he meant to say that one-third of the people of this country were poverty stricken or without clothing or without shelter.

Mr. President, I again express the hope that when we meet again, after we see the results of the expenditures that have been made and of the work that may be undertaken under the pending bill, we will be able to rejoice and be happy and hold up our heads and feel that we have done one of the greatest services to human beings in taking them out of insanitary, unhealthy, diseased, dilapidated homes and giving them a chance to breathe God's fresh air and enjoy peace and plenty in life.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the Senate has been considering the pending bill for 3 days, and it is not my purpose or intention to indulge in any further details with respect to the measure. I do ask, however, that the amendments submitted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] be rejected. The adoption of the first two amendments proposed by him would simply mean that the rate of rehousing activity contemplated under the original legislation and under the amendments of the Housing Act adopted last year and those now proposed by the bill under consideration would be cut very drastically; moreover, it would cut in half the volume of the new activity contemplated by the pending bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. How could that possibly be so under the amendment I have offered? How could the work be cut in half? Is not the money proposed to be provided sufficient to continue the work? The peak is not going to be reached until 1940 or far into 1941.

Mr. ELLENDER. The program now under way will employ about 160,000 men at its peak in early 1940. After that period, unless we enact the pending bill, there will be a sharp decline in employment. Now, the Senator from Ohio con-

Mr. TAFT. I should like to correct the Senator again. That will be in 1940. The amendment takes care of the situation up to that time.

Mr. ELLENDER. Just a minute, Senator. It is our purpose under this bill to continue the employment of those now at work and to increase their number. If the bill as proposed is adopted, it will mean that during 1940 a peak of almost 240,000 men employed will be reached, and that more than 200,000 men will be employed at all times from the early spring of 1940 to the end of 1941. In addition to the activity made possible under the present law, the pending bill would create in all about 466,000 man-years of employment; the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio would reduce this by about 200,000 man-years. Certainly that is an entirely undesirable policy, particularly since the present period is so favorable for building purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator if there have been made commitments in excess of the $800,000,000; and if so, by what authority? Eight hundred million dollars have been authorized. There was no promise that $800,000,000 more were to be appropriated.

Mr. ELLENDER. There have been no commitments made, I will say to the Senator, in excess of the present law; but many applications are now pending that will absorb, as it were, the additional $800,000,000 which we are now proposing.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows that when the $800,000,000 were appropriated it was not anticipated that we would be called upon to appropriate $800,000,000 more. I am sure that many Senators who voted for the measure and many who supported it believed that it was an experiment. wanted to see the effect of the experiment before venturing further into an unknown land.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator think that is all that was contemplated? I believe the Senate appreciated full well that we were embarking on a permanent housing program to rehouse slum dwellers, to provide permanency of employment and business in the great construction industries, and thus to give greater stability to industry generally. How can the Senator say that recurring authorizations were not intended, when the whole legislation is cast in permanent terms and contemplates the gradual abolition of the slums? Certainly, the Senator never thought that the original $500,-000,000-loan authorization in 1937 would make a serious dent on the slums of America. That was just a starter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield. Mr. BARKLEY. In view of the impatience of Senators on account of the garden party to be held this afternoon at the British Embassy, and the desire that Senators will not leave the Chamber, I wish to say that I have communicated with the British Embassy and I find that Senators are not required to be there until 4:40 o'clock this afternoon. Under the order adopted yesterday, the Senate will vote today at 3 o'clock on the pending bill. It seems to me that that will give all Senators sufficient time to reach their homes and prepare whatever sartorial arrangements they may desire to make in order to attend the reception at the Embassy. I hope inasmuch as we are required under the rule to proceed to vote at 3 o'clock, without further debate, that Senators will not absent themselves until we have voted on this bill.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from Louisiana will yield for that purpose, let me say that we have already entered into an arrangement by previous order to meet tomorrow at 10:30 o'clock a.m., for the purpose of assembling prior to going into the rotunda to meet the King and Queen. Assuming that this bill will be disposed of today, it will be my purpose tomorrow to ask that, at the conclusion of those ceremonies, the Senate stand adjourned until Monday next.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator to refer to a time limit on the debate on the pending bill. Is there a limit upon individual Senators?

Mr. BARKLEY. The agreement provides that the Senate shall proceed to vote at 3 o'clock p. m. on the bill and all amendments. There is no limitation on individual Senators.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I was simply going to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to what seems to me to be a most unusual circumstance in reference to the unanimous-consent agreement. The unanimous-consent agreement was submitted and then unanimous consent was obtained to waive the rule as to the calling of a quorum. In other words, we have a rule in the Senate which provides that before a time may be fixed for a final vote on a measure a quorum shall be called in order that Senators may be advised; but by unanimous consent, with perhaps 8 or 10 Senators present, that rule was waived and the unanimousconsent agreement entered into to fix a time for a final vote on the bill. It seems to me to be an extremely bad precedent. I was present, so I have no complaint about it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that it is not a precedent at all; the same procedure has been followed on a number of occasions. I will say also that there were more than eight Senators present at the time. I made the request after consulting Senators on both sides of the Chamber who desired to dispose of the pending bill yesterday, but, largely because of the fact that the Senator from Utah [Mr. King] desired to speak on the bill, it went over and was not voted on yesterday. The agreement was entered into by all Senators who were present and was agreeable to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ADAMS. My comment was simply on what I thought was at least the establishment of a bad precedent, that we were setting aside a rule which had a very definite purpose, namely, that Senators who were absent from the Chamber should not be bound by a unanimous-consent agreement when they were not even notified that the request for such an agreement was to be made.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate what the Senator says, and it has not been done often, but it has been done two or three times.

Mr. ADAMS. I realize that when the King and Queen are coming the situation may be different.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are always special circumstances which justify special treatment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was not present when the unanimous-consent agreement was made, and, therefore, I am not really in a position to raise any objection, but this is the third time to my knowledge when unanimous-consent agreements have been made without observing the rule which has been referred to. I think the rule ought to be observed. or else finally disposed of. I say that at this time, because next time I hope to be present long enough to make an objection.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, besides the fact that more labor will be employed by expanding the present program, another reason why the amendments of the Senator from Ohio should be defeated is that so far only 29 States are participating in the program. We have a total of 19 States which have not received a penny toward rehousing; and all of these States except 10 have enacted the necessary legislation in order to carry through a housing program.

I desire to insert in the RECORD at this time a statement-I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it-showing the decrease in the amount of labor employed if the proposal of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] is adopted in contrast with the pending bill. This statement compares the differences not only as to labor, the increased number of dwellings, and so forth, but also as to materials that will be used under the program as we are now proposing it, and under the program as it would stand if the amendments of the Senator from Ohio should be adopted.

I ask unanimous consent to have the statement printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, before taking my seat let me urge that the Senate defeat the third amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

It proposes a joint congressional investigation of the administration of the U.S. H. A. and other Federal housing agencies. The program of the U.S. H. A., according to the Senator from Ohio, is working smoothly. I quote from a statement by him on June 6:

I believe that the United States Housing Administration has done its work well in this field. Its projects are well built. The cost is being steadily reduced. There has not been the slightest breath of suspicion in a field where the opportunity is always present.

I submit that an investigation of administration implies widespread dissatisfaction or complaints.

It is contrary to and repudiates the President's plan for reorganization already approved by Congress and which is becoming effective in part on July 1. The amendment proposes study of the proper location and placement of all Federal housing agencies, although Congress has just approved a reorganization plan covering this question.

It proposes a special committee to study housing questions that regular committees of Congress have held hearings on for 5 years. All the information sought by the amendment is in the printed hearings and reports of these committees.

Senator Taff is on the Senate committee which has been holding hearings every year on the U.S. H. A. Why does he want to create a different committee for the same purpose?

No, Mr. President. Little would be gained by such an investigation. If one is necessary, why could it not be conducted by the standing committee of the Senate, or a subcommittee thereof, that deals with such matters?

I repeat, I earnestly request that all three amendments be rejected.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, there seems to be a great desire to vote on the pending amendments and on the bili. It is a perfectly natural desire, and I shall not detain the Senate for any great length of time. In fact, I shall speak very briefly. I could not help, however, being disturbed during the course of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh], especially when he said that this great humanitarian program which was inaugurated by the Congress for the purpose of actual slum clearance is being diverted from that purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. No.

Mr. HATCH. I am quoting only what the Senator from Massachusetts said.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts said that the present program of the U. S. H. A. is being diverted from the purposes of the act. I think what the Senator had in mind was the earlier construction under the P. W. A.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I did not hear what the Senator from New Mexico said.

Mr. HATCH. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to say that the program which we started as a slum-clearance program was not being used for slum-clearance purposes.

Mr. WALSH. I said there were two undertakings by the Federal Government in the way of providing houses for the people of the Nation. The first was undertaken by a housing bureau under the Department of the Interior with funds allocated by the President from the $4,000,000,000 lump-sum appropriation of a few years ago. It was thought that that would be a slum-clearance undertaking. It was not, and is not. I denounced it then, and I denounce it now.

The second attempt was by an act of Congress. There was no act of Congress in the first attempt, and there has always been a question whether or not it was constitutional. The second undertaking was the act of the last session, which for the first time put the Congress on record as favoring a Federal housing project. No dwellings have been completed under that act up to this time. I did not intend to imply that in my opinion the intent of the Congress was not being carried out under that law, but the first I was very critical of, and I am still critical of it.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from New York made that explanation, because I received the other impression; and I rose to voice my opposition to any such procedure as would convert a humanitarian program, such as I conceive this to be, into something else.

Mr. ADAMS and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HATCH. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado; then I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact, with which he is probably familiar, that the act itself has a double purpose. It provides that the projects under it may be either slum-clearance projects or low-rent housing projects. The low-rent housing projects concerning which the Senator from Massachusetts was complaining are included within the scope of the act.

Mr. HATCH. I now yield to the Senator from New York.
Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should like to differ right there with the interpretation placed upon the act by the Senator from Colorado, because under an amendment—which, incidentally, was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Walsh]—for every unit of new housing constructed under the act a unit of slums must be cleared; and the families to be housed are those who have formerly been slum dwellers. Therefore, under every contract which has been let under the U. S. H. A., a showing must first be made that slums equal to the number of units to be constructed have been eliminated. Therefore this is bound to be a humanitarian slum-clearance program. Let me assure the Senator that I have kept in close touch with it, and it actually is a slum-clearance program.

I do not want to delay a vote, and I do not want to discuss the matter at length. Of course, there will always be some persons in a municipality who will contend that the area cleared was not actually a blighted area. If that is so, that reflects on the integrity of the local housing authorities. But so far as I know—and I have investigated the subject very thoroughly—for every project that is proposed to be constructed there has been an equivalent amount of slum clearance. The purpose of the act has been definitely and clearly observed, notwithstanding some unfounded statements made by persons who have a prejudice against the whole program.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. HATCH. I will yield, but I want to get through with the brief remarks I desire to make. I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. TYDINGS. I had considerable correspondence with the United States Housing Administrator on the elimination of slums when new dwelling units took their place, on the theory that one slum dwelling was to be eliminated for each new family apartment constructed; and I believe that policy is being carried out, with this exception: The act does not say "demolished." It says "eliminated"; and in some instances the Administrator in his correspondence pointed out that, due to overcrowding, the actual slum dwelling is not demolished, but is renovated; and if it is renovated, that is equivalent to its elimination.

I have not those letters here, but I had correspondence with Mr. Straus on the subject, because the Real Estate Board of Baltimore called to my attention the fact that some buildings were not being torn down, and I called Mr. Straus' attention to the fact that the law required that that be done; and he pointed out that the law does not require that the buildings be demolished. It requires that they be eliminated. Therefore, if they are reconditioned so as to take them out of the category of slum dwellings, without tearing them down, that, in Mr. Straus' judgment, is an elimination under the act.

I shall be very glad to show the Senator from New York the correspondence if he would like to see it.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President-

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I suggest that the Senators continue their discussion between themselves.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; I think that would be better.

Mr. HATCH. I merely want to say that this program, as well as many other humanitarian programs, cannot be laid out in detail by the Congress of the United States. The only thing we can do is to express the general will and intention of the Congress. It necessarily depends upon those who administer the law to see that the intention of Congress is carried out, and if they administer it in a way contrary to the intention and design of the Congress of the United States they offend not against us, but against the very program which they seek to serve.

In that connection, let me say that I rose mainly to quote from Edmund Burke, who many, many years ago made a statement which I should like to see pasted on the desk of every administrative officer engaged in executing any of the humanitarian programs which this administration, I believe rightfully, has inaugurated. Mr. Burke said:

The laws reach but a very little way. Constitute government how you please; infinitely the greater part of it must depend upon the exercise of powers which are left at large to the prudence and uprightness of ministers of state.

I should like to see the Housing Authority and all other officials charged with carrying on this program read that statement, and remember that the programs must be administered with prudence and uprightness.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word in regard to the matter suggested by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr.

HATCH].

I believe that it was the understanding of substantially all Senators when the original housing act was under consideration that it was for the purpose of eliminating slums, particularly in New York City, and a few of the other large municipalities in the United States. As I recall the debate, no one suggested then that we were embarking upon a general housing program. We were not intending to build homes for the people in the country or for the people in the cities; we were to get rid of slums. I know the eloquent Senator from New York repeatedly in his perorations, as well as in his exordium, referred to the fact that if we got rid of the slums we would get rid of cess pools of vice and crime; that it was essential that we get rid of slums. He emphasized that idea over and over again. I now agree with the intimation that is made, that we are distorting the act, and are converting it into a building program.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I hope the Senator will not make these statements unless he is absolutely sure of the facts. There is a good deal of this sort of propaganda being spread against this program.

Mr. KING. The propaganda is all for it.

Mr. WAGNER. Let me assure the Senator that there are now 29 States in which these projects are in progress, under contract or under construction, and in every one of those cases the elimination of slums must accompany the construction of new homes for these low-income slum dwellers, who have been compelled to live in these very cess pools referred to by the Senator, which breed disease and crime. So that when the Senator says in the first place that it was only for New York and some other cities—

Mr. KING. I said the large municipalities in the United States.

Mr. WAGNER. Twenty-nine States now have actual projects under contract and 10 additional States have made application for other projects. In every one of those cases the construction of the new buildings is accompanied by the elimination of slums. I do not mind anyone being opposed if he is opposed to the philosophy of this humanitarian program. That is his business, and I never question his sincerity. But I do not think we ought to have these statements made.—

Mr. KING. If the Senator wants to make a speech—and he has spoken half a dozen times already—he can wait until I get through.

Mr. WAGNER. I am pleading with the Senator to inquire into the facts before he is led to make these statements.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have inquired into the facts, and while I do not know as much about this subject, of course, as does the Senator from New York, because he has devoted a good deal of time to its consideration, I do emphasize what I stated a moment ago, that the act was driven through the Senate largely because of the propaganda in favor of getting rid of the slums. I do admit that in connection with getting rid of the slums it was suggested that corresponding houses would be built which would take care of those who were driven out of the slums. But I fear that the act is being converted into a general housing proposition, and the Senator now proposes to offer an amendment to tack on to the pending bill a provision that the administration shall go into the country and build houses in various parts of the United States.

I rose for the purpose of indicating that I fear the law upon the statute books is being diverted from the purpose for which some of us at least intended that it should be used, and that the bill now before us will be regarded as an opportunity for building houses, and not for eliminating slums, and that therefore the foundation upon which the original act was passed will be abandoned entirely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr.

TAFT] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll. The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be

The Legislative Clerk. On page 6, between lines 3 and 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 7. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives is hereby established to consist of five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and five Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate. It shall be the duty of such committee to make a comprehensive study of the activities of the Federal Government in the field of housing, particularly as administered by the United States Housing Authority, the Federal Housing Administration, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and other agencies of a temporary or emergency nature. Such committee agencies of a temporary or emergency nature. Such committee agencies of a temporary of the space of the middle-income groups with a minimum of outright Government midde-income groups and income administrative head and the consolidation or elimination of agencies where such consolidation or elimination will promote greater economy and efficiency in administration; and in the housing field.

(3) The stimulation of private investment and private industry in the housing field.

Such committee shall report its findings to the Congress not later than January 3, 1940, and shall recommend such legislation as it may deem necessary to carry out the objectives set forth in this section.

For the purposes of this section, such joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings; to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-sixth Congress; to employ such clerical and other assistants; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; to take such testimony; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be disbursed one-half by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers approved by the chairman. The appropriation of such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of this section is hereby authorized.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word about the amendment. It seems to me it certainly should not be adopted. For more than a year Congress has been considering the question of reorganization of the various departments and branches of the Government. The President has issued two proclamations putting into effect two plans of reorganization. Under the last plan adopted, which will go into effect July 1, the United States Housing Authority is, of course, in the Interior Department, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Housing Administration are put into a new lending agency which had been consolidated out of the R. F. C., the H. O. L. C., the F. H. A., and other lending agencies.

It seems to me that we should not now attach an amendment to the Housing Act providing that these very agencies which have been consolidated, and the consolidation of which will go into effect on July 1, shall be investigated before they have had an opportunity to demonstrate how efficiently they can perform their respective functions under the reorganization plan of the President, as approved by the Congress.

Certainly at this stage of the proceeding, both of the consideration of the bill and of the reorganization plan, it would be most unwise to provide here for an investigation in advance. Give these departments and these agencies a chance to function under the new arrangement and the new organization, and then if they do not justify the reorganization and justify their existence, Congress will have plenty of time to investigate.

It seems to me it would be unwise at this time to provide any such investigation as that provided in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I explained the amendment yesterday. It makes no proposal to investigate these agencies. It provides for a joint committee of Congress to develop a unified policy with respect to housing in the United States. We have no unified policy in the United States with respect to housing. We have three different policies. They have not been coordinated. We do not know what our policy ought to be.

Mr. President, we should consider Government housing and private housing at the same time, at one time. There never has been any such committee in the history of recent Congresses, as far as I know. Each policy has been developed by those interested in their own particular kind of housing.

It seems to me that the majority leader is deliberately saying "I do not want to develop a consistent housing policy in the United States"—

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. TAFT. But that we should have the matter of housing in three different agencies, placed in three agencies even after the reorganization is completed.

I desire to have the activities coordinated. Congress ought to know what is the correct policy for the next 20 years, how many houses ought to come under the plan for Government low-cost housing, the building of how many houses by private endeavor ought to be stimulated, or for how many houses we need to have insurance. All that ought to be done at one time, and only a committee of Congress can sit as an arbiter between those who hold different theories with respect to housing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, just a word.

Congress appointed a joint committee on reorganization. The joint committee held only two sessions before it became perfectly obvious that the committee would have to separate if results were to be achieved on the question of reorganization, and thereafter the Senate and House committees proceeded separately to make their investigations and bring in a bill.

In spite of the statement of the Senator from Ohio—who seems to have the last word on all subjects—that I am deliberately seeking to prevent an investigation, I am not doing anything of the sort. I am undertaking to give the reorganized agencies of the Federal Government a chance to function, and if they do not function properly, Congress through its proper committees—not necessarily through a joint committee, but through the committees which have framed this legislation and framed the reorganization bill—can make its investigations with respect to legislation as circumstances may justify in the future.

The President probably has gone as far as he felt it wise to go in consolidating the various housing agencies. The Congress put the Housing Authority in the Department of the Interior when the Authority was organized 2 or 3 years ago. Congress established the Federal Housing Authority as an independent agency. Congress established the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as a separate lending agency. Congress established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as a separate lending agency. The President, under authority conferred upon him by Congress, has consolidated all these lending agencies except one, and that is the United States Housing Authority, whose functions we are now enlarging and extending, and which is a part of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Nothing that is accomplished in the reorganization program will affect the legislative policy of Congress. Mr. BARKLEY. It may very properly affect it.

Mr. TAFT. The amendment provides for a committee to develop a legislative policy, not an administrative policy or a policy for the consolidation of agencies.

Mr. BARKLEY. The performance of the duties of these agencies after they are consolidated may have a very proper effect upon the legislative policy of Congress. I will say to the Senator that it has never been found feasible or successful to have joint committees try to frame legislation dealing with any department. They nearly always have to separate, and go their separate ways, in order to arrive at any recommendation which will be returned to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Taft] to the amendment reported by the committee. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. TAFT. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, earlier in the day I said that I had an amendment which I proposed to offer. We have only 10 minutes left. I have been informed by one of the Senators that he, among others, desires to discuss my amendment, which I regard as very important. It provides a program for rural housing in the blighted areas under the same conditions which must be found to exist in the case of houses in congested areas.

We are to vote on the bill at 3 o'clock. I suggested to the Senator that I would not press the amendment today but would appear before the House committee having this legislation under consideration and do my utmost to persuade the House committee to include in the present bill housing for rural areas.

There are wiser minds in the Senate than mine. I know other Senators are greatly interested in the subject. If they have any better suggestion as to procedure, I shall be delighted to follow it. I have conferred with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER].

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President-

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I should like to ask the Senator from New York why we should not vote on the amendment at this

Mr. WAGNER. Very well; I am quite willing.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. KING. There has been no opportunity for discussion or consideration of the amendment. I think we ought not to take up the amendment at this time. I have an amendment to offer; and if the amendment of the Senator from New York is taken up, I shall ask for consideration of my amendment. I have assented to the view expressed by my friend from New York with the understanding that I shall ask the committee of the House to consider the amendment which I am about to offer when the bill is before it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from New York will offer his amendment. I think the people residing in the country are entitled to it.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 6, after line 3, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. The United States Housing Act of 1937, as amended, is hereby amended—

(a) By inserting immediately following the enacting clause the words: "Title I."

(b) By adding at the end of said act a new title, as follows:

"TITLE II "RURAL HOUSING

"SEC. 201. The Authority is hereby authorized and directed to develop and undertake a comprehensive program to assist public housing agencies in the development and administration of projects for farm families of low income in rural areas. Such assistance may be extended under loan, annual contributions, and capital-grant contracts permitting (subject to such limitations and conditions as the Authority may prescribe) public housing agencies to make long-term leases or purchase agreements or otherwise to rent or sell rural housing to farmers. With respect to those States which do not now provide for public housing agencies embracing rural areas, the Authority shall give aid and information requested by such States concerning the creation of public agencies which would be eligible and would qualify for financial assistance from the Authority for the development and administration of projects for farm families of low income in rural areas.

"Sec. 202. In the development of a comprehensive program for rural housing for farm families of low income, the Authority and the Department of Agriculture are authorized to work in cooperation with each other and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to utilize such employees and facilities of the Department of Agriculture as may assist in the development of such a program. The Authority may reimburse the Secretary of Agriculture for the salaries and expenses of such employees and facilities as are utilized by the Secretary for any of the purposes of this title.

"Sec. 203. All of the provisions of title I of this act, insofar of this title.

"Sec. 203. All of the provisions of title I of this act, insofar as applicable, shall apply to this title."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment. I should like to read a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture to Mr. Straus. I think he expresses my view better than I could:

JUNE 6, 1939. My Dear Mr. Straus: I have your letter inquiring as to my views regarding the problem of providing decent housing for farm families of low income. I am fully in agreement with you regarding the seriousness of this problem and the urgent need for action to relieve the plight of the ill-housed farmer. Too often people assume that all farmers are living under conditions conducive to good health and well-being. Actually many low-income farm families are living under the most deplorable and unhealthful conditions, and no private or Government program has yet been able to reach the lowest-income farm families living under these conditions. While various agencies in the Department of Agriculture have been engaged in the program of improving housing conditions in rural areas, these agencies are not able to serve the lowest-income farm groups living under the worst housing conditions.

It is for these reasons that I would welcome the extension of the ILS HA program to the rural housing field. Lam glad that you

It is for these reasons that I would welcome the extension of the U.S. H. A. program to the rural housing field. I am glad that you appreciate the very close relationship between the entire farm economy and the problem of rehousing the low-income farmer. In my judgment, the proposed program of rural housing can only be effectively carried out through cooperation between your agency and the Department of Agriculture. The whole problem of housing in rural areas is one which requires special treatment because the sources, amounts, and stability of farm income present such different problems from those involved in an urban housing program. The congertation of the Department of Agriculture and the gram. The cooperation of the Department of Agriculture and the U.S. H. A. would make it possible to bring to this problem the housing experience of your agency and the agricultural experience housing experience of your agency and the agricultural experience of this Department.

I have been following very closely the work of our interdepartmental committee on rural housing. In my opinion, the proposed amendment to the United States Housing Act is highly desirable. Under it a comprehensive program could be developed and undertaken to assist public housing agencies in the development of housing projects for families of low income in rural areas. I hope that this amendment is adopted so that we may commence an attack upon the much-neglected problem of the ill-housed farm family.

Very sincerely yours.

Very sincerely yours,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary of Agriculture.

Hon. NATHAN STRAUS, Administrator, United States Housing Authority, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the purpose of the amendment is a good one. So long as we are going to have slum clearance it ought to prevail in rural areas as well as in urban centers. However, the amendment does not provide a slumclearance program. All it says is that the United States Housing Authority is authorized to institute a program. There is no limitation on the cost of the houses. There is no limitation on the cost per room.

Mr. WAGNER. Let me say to the Senator that the limitation provided in the act applies to this situation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Where is the limitation?
Mr. WAGNER. If there is any question about that, I will say to the Senator-

Mr. TYDINGS. Where is the limitation?

Mr. WAGNER. It is a part of the entire act.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not see that at all. The amendment is subsequent to the entire act, and, in my judgment, is a new subject matter. There is no limitation of any kind in the amendment; and while I do not wish to be captious and hunt trouble to defeat the Senator's amendment, because I think it ought to be in the bill, I submit that the amendment does not provide a plan. Let me read from it:

The Authority is hereby authorized and directed to develop and undertake a comprehensive program to assist public housing agencies in the development and administration of projects for farm families of low income in rural areas.

There is absolutely no limitation. The amendment provides no plan. It is just as though we had said in the first instance, "Here is $600,000,000. Clear up the slums of America. Formulate a comprehensive plan, and go to work."

If Congress wants to do that, all right; but I do not think Congress wants to go quite that far.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the last paragraph of the amendment reads:

Sec. 203. All of the provisions of title ${\tt I}$ of this act, insofar as applicable, shall apply to this title.

Mr. TYDINGS. Why "insofar as applicable"? Mr. WAGNER. The amendment permits long-term leases, purchase agreements, or other arrangements to rent or sell rural housing to farmers.

Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous consent agreement, the Senate is now required to proceed to vote upon the amendments and on the bill to final passage.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, between lines 3 and 4, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 7. Section 10 of the United States Housing Act of 1937 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

'(f) No grants, loans, or credit assistance shall be made under

"(3) there shall have been provided within the areas under the jurisdiction of the county, city, or public housing agency orderly and systematic arrangements for the future control and operation of any housing constructed within such areas, and such arrangements of any housing constructed within such areas, and such arrangements are administered by a representative and nonpartisan body which is organized in such a manner as to accomplish the fullest measure of local public trusteeship."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TRUMAN (when the name of Mr. Clark of Missouri was called). I am authorized to announce that if my colleague [Mr. Clark of Missouri] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). While I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel free to vote, and vote "nay." The Senator from South Carolina, I am advised, has a special pair on this vote.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON). Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my

Mr. LEE (when the name of Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma was called). My colleague [Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma] is unavoidably absent. If he were present, I am informed he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. Ashurst] is necessarily absent. I am informed that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. KING (after having voted in the negative). I agreed to pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]. He is still detained from the Chamber. I am compelled, therefore, to withdraw my vote, as the Senator from West Virginia, if present, would vote opposite to the way I voted.

Mr. HATCH. My colleague [Mr. Chavez] is unavoidably detained. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

Mr. McNARY. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], who has a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. George], is absent because of an operation.

I also announce the general pair of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Shipstead] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASSI.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Danaher] is unavoidably out of the city. He has a pair on this question with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Smith]. The Senator from Connecticut would vote "yea," and I am advised that the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay" if present.

The Senator from California [Mr. Johnson] has a pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton]. If present. the Senator from California would vote "nay," and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "yea."

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Austin] has a pair with the Senator from California [Mr. Downey]. If present, the Senator from Vermont would vote "nay," and the Senator from California would vote "yea."

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from California [Mr. Downey], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Overton], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Smathers], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Van Nuys] are unavoidably detained from the Senate. I am advised that if present and voting those Senators would vote "yea."

The Senators from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes and Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained. I am advised that if pres-

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT FROM FRIDAY TO MONDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, under the previous order, the Senate will meet tomorrow at 10:30 a. m. for the purpose of assembling, and then proceeding to the rotunda of the Capitol to receive Their Majesties the King and Queen of Great Britain. There will be no other business transacted tomorrow, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the ceremonies in the rotunda the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does the Senator from Kentucky mean that when the Senate leaves its Chamber here it will adjourn out in the rotunda?

Mr. BARKLEY. It does not make much difference. I request that at the conclusion of the official ceremonies the Senate shall stand adjourned. Of course, if the Senator objects—

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not object, but I think it would be very bad practice for the Senate to adjourn out in the rotunda.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would not make any difference whether we adjourn in the rotunda or adjourn in the Chamber. What I am trying to bring about is an adjournment of the Senate at the conclusion of the proceedings tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate should adjourn before proceeding to the rotunda, it would proceed individually to the rotunda—not as a Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. I amend my request by asking that as soon as we pass out of the door here on the way to the rotunda the Senate shall officially stand adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION TO SIGN BILLS, ETC., DURING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that during the period when the Senate shall stand adjourned the Vice President be authorized to sign bills and resolutions, that the committees be authorized to report, and that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive messages from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Minton in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, heretofore agreed to, until tomorrow, Friday, June 9, 1939, at 10:30 c'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 8, 1939

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art our fathers' God. Glory, honor, dominion, and power belongeth unto Thee. We praise Thee for our glorious heritage. Be pleased, O Lord, to preserve the health and strength of the gracious sovereigns from across the sea whom we delight to welcome and honor. Do Thou bless abundantly these two great peoples that have come out of the loins of the mighty past. Bestow upon them the same wisdom, the same courage, and Christian fortitude which shall bring in their train all earthly good. Grant that these two nations may be guarded by Thy holy providence from all temptations to tyranny and all evil passion. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those whom we entrust in Thy name with the authority of governance, to the end that there be peace at home and that we keep a place among the nations of the world. Defend their liberties and preserve their unity, and let every weapon be broken that is forged in the fires of hate. O come, peace of God, and dwell again on earth, where fields of strife lie desolate and barren. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S.189. An act to provide for the confiscation of firearms in possession of persons convicted of felony and disposition thereof.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 5610) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. Overton, Mr. Glass, Mr. Thomas of Oklahoma, Mr. Burke, Mr. King, Mr. Nye, and Mr. Bridges to be the conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

THE LATE WILL ROGERS

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Speaker, on day before yesterday in Statuary Hall there was unveiled a monument in honor of Will Rogers. I think it most appropriate now, if I can get consent to do so, to put in the Record a speech made by one of our colleagues in this Congress before he became a Member of this body on the life and character of the late Will Rogers. It is a masterpiece and ought to be inserted in the Record at this time; and, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert this address at this point in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered. There was no objection.

The address referred to follows:

TWO IRREPLACEABLE AMERICANS

(By T. V. SMITH, for the National Democratic Committee broadcast, October 9, 1936)

My fellow countrymen, I am only an ignorant man and a philosopher, but I think I know what it means to be human. It means to dream, to embody dreams in deeds, to love and be loved. And I think I understand what politics mean—not a game of chance but a labor of love for the sake of life, more life, better life. Now, I suppose that it befalls nobody not to be loved by somebody. But it befalls few to stir the hearts of many. Thinking of such things the other night, I decided that there are two men in public life today that are irreplaceable. I mean men irreplaceable in the sense that Jane Addams was irreplaceable. One of these men is no longer with us; death takes what life cannot replace.

WILL ROGERS, THE INIMITABLE WILL

You know, of course, whom I mean—Will Rogers. Dead, Rogers still speaks from the screen. He still smiles through his books. He still lives in our fond memories. A national shrine goes up in his honor, and every week witnesses some new symbol of his vivid immortality. Upon his death I celebrated his love of life in these lines:

Since in some midnight quietness,
Or roseate burst of dawn,
Or full-day foggy frightfulness,
His wings have haply fawned to earth,
And his friendly feverishness of life
Has surrendered its quick charms
To the final dreamlessness of death— To the final dreamlessness of death—
Enfolding, nescient arms—
Say this and only this you say
Of him on each Memorial Day:
He loved his life but recked it not
And gladly died while the blood was hot!
He loved life, loved it all,
Loved that, too, that quick last fall!

Loved that, too, that quick last fall!

That was the trait, I think, which endeared Will Rogers to us beyond other men, his fond love of life. He loved life so much that he could not hate any living thing. Back and forth across the "Smith and Wesson" line he shuttled as good-will ambassador from South to North, from North to South. In his lasso of love he brought the breezy West to the East and took the worldly-wise East back to the West. Whether wisecracking on Broadway or fraternizing in Main Street, he was the one touch of nature that made all Americans kin. Circling Will Rogers with the twirling twine, twirled as a maiden toys with her glove, he shot over and through his gobs of gum the juices of merry life this way and that. Whenever he noosed in these vital spirals of meandering monologs he tied snugly to himself with lasting cords of friend-liness.

monologs he tied snugly to himself with lasting cords of friend-liness.

Would that he were here to laugh us out of our present political hates and to kid us back once more into his roomy sanity. Faith we need his humor today, with big men being made little through envy and little men being raised to the pinnacle by loud talk. His humor would shame political meanness.

Rogers' humor has caused his name to be linked with that other great American, Mark Twain. But not justly so. Twain made the mistake, if mistake it be, of trying to make sense to himself of the things at which men laugh. That is to be a philosopher in the grand and tragic manner, bearing, like some introverted Atlas, the woe of the world's weight in the heart. Such chewing of life's dark cud often paves a path through personal anguish to final bitterness; and, alas, leaves the world much as it was before. Not thus to weary one's soul, however, with the heavy weight of the world's senselessness and of man's inhumanity to man, is to commit the mortal sin against one's own spirit, if perchance one be born to carry such woe in the heart. Mark Twain was born to carry this burden; Will Rogers was not.

But another burden Rogers carried, lightly and gaily, the burden of universal friendliness. Object of all our affection, he carried a piece of each of us to the grave. Him who had mixed naturally with the multitudes of many lands and had mingled with the mighty everywhere, him who had ridden the ranges with youthful abandon, him who had scaled with a grin of glee a thousand aerial heights unharmed—him the outer fates lured with fun to the lonely north and did his friendly soul to death with a single companion from a silly dip of 60 feet.

Frankklin Roosevelly the single part of the problem.

FRANKLIN ROOSEVELT, THE INIMITABLE LEADER

It was at the Chicago convention which nominated Franklin Roosevelt that I first met Will Rogers. I met him in the company of that other elemental American, Clarence Darrow, our modern Socrates, gadfly of this gaudy generation. It was the day before I met Roosevelt. These two men—Rogers and Roosevelt—have remained associated in my mind. Queer association, that! Will Rogers, mixed-breed Cherokee, born poor, grown rich—lusty, vulgar, lovable! Franklin Roosevelt, the blue-blood, scion of Revolutionary heritage, survivor of Harvard, squire of Hyde Park! Rogers, the low-born; Roosevelt, the high-born—queer bedfellows, those, for my memory! Still they both knew how to give it—and how to take it. And best of all, they both were Democrats who loved life wherever life is found. It was this latter trait which makes them irreplaceable. Many living men live only north-northwest; alive in body, they are fearful at heart; or powerful of mind, they have the muscles of a Micky Mouse. These two men lived life wholly and fully.

They have both lived so fully, indeed, that they have no envy of others. Both grew great-souled—the one under the lasting lure, the other under a later lash, of life. The meeting of our common American affection in these two extreme types shows the vitality of our great democracy. We are still free enough to afford the luxury of prizing variety. The recent hate of Roosevelt is but the temporary souring of life in lesser men, not in him.

Roosevelt has set himself to do through political action what Rogers did in humor, what all of us do in aspiration—to make of all conflicting interests one welfare, one people, one nation. His acceptance speech of the first nomination was the magna carta of his whole administration because it was the testament of his whole life. In it he said that agriculture, industry, commerce are equally indispensable and must therefore be woven together into a seamless web of national life. Other nations have sought to take this kingdom of harmony violently, resorting to blood and iron in order to surmount class animosity growing out of these conflicting interests. This arduous task Roosevelt undertook for America through the sweet reasonableness of compromise and the high calm ways of peace. But agriculture first, since it had long been made last by Republicans.

The first time I ever saw Roosevelt, then Governor of this empire called New York, was at a scientific farm gathering at that New York State center of agricultural science, Cornell University. He was conferring upon the best husbandmen of this State the title "Master Farmer."

"Master Farmer.

"Master Farmer."

The next time I saw him, and the first time I met him, was in 1932. Subject? Agriculture—the soil and the fate of Americans dependent upon the soil. I advised him—let me blush to acknowledge it—advised him to say as little as possible about agriculture in the then campaign. I thought it was a subject about which he would do least after election. So why promise? You see, I was then under the impression that each President had to be much like the mine run. It had been 12 long years since we had a President who was free enough to be different. After listening patiently to me, he made me listen to him. He told me how many Americans were dependent, directly and indirectly, upon agriculture, how unfair their standard of life, how crippling to industry and commerce their low purchasing power, how, in short, America's soul is bound up with America's soil. Then, with a gesture and a flash of the eye that I shall never forget, he said, as I recall his very words, "In such a situation it is both my temperament and my philosophy to do something, and I am going to do something for my philosophy to do something, and I am going to do something for agriculture in America."

agriculture in America."

That from a sophisticated New Yorker. As a midwesterner, I had my doubts. But not for long and never again. By giving the American farmer a policy of his own, Roosevelt deserves the degree "Master Farmer." He has literally made agriculture respectable for even Republicans to promise things for, to, or at. With agriculture restored to self-respect, with a national policy all its own, he now drives to make a high-functioning unity of his happy trinity of restored agriculture, prespective industry, even ding compared.

he now drives to make a high-functioning unity of his happy trinity of restored agriculture, prosperous industry, expanding commerce. There is no man like Roosevelt in America today. I do not say that we must continue to have him for President; no; no man is indispensible to a democracy. But I do say this quiet thing: That Roosevelt, like Will Rogers, is irreplaceable. His roomy sense is so common that he is the natural symbol of the national unity which we crave—of national unity at a level of honor. Moreover, he has done for us this one greatest thing—he has shown that democratic government does not have to be weak under stress. He has shown that it may be a government as strong in abnormal as it is easygoing in normal times. That was the reassurance humanity most needed to hurl back from the New World the steady tramp of ruthless might, in European dictatorships, red, brown, or black.

Political platforms are the parties static. Political practitioners are the parties dynamic, when they are dynamic. The Democratic Party is dynamic today, and largely because this natural aristocrat, like Jefferson at the beginning, put his steady head and his quick heart gladly to breaking the shackles that cramp the energies of common men. These two great Democrats, Rogers and Roosevelt, both lived happily and greatly, and both dedicated themselves to life, more life, better life.

"The glory that was Greece is dust, The honor that was Rome is done, For one by one our jewels rust,
And temples crumble one by one.
Yet when the towers of stone are gone,
The steady stream of life flows on.

"For wind and water, sun and air Wreak stealthy havoc everywhere, The stoutest seawall cannot hide The steady onslaughts of the tide, And beams of cedar slowly rot, And vines break through where thieves may not.

"Yet still in wandering you may meet A girl with Cleopatra's face— A figure on the crowded street
Has something still of Sappho's grace,
So life, the frailest thing of all, Outlasts the sternest castle wall!"

With thanks and apologies to Jamie Sexton Holme-Permanence, in Star Gatherer.

THE BROOKLYN SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this afternoon throughout Brooklyn and Queens in the city of New York, thousands and thousands of men, women, and children are participating in the annual anniversary day parade of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union.

This parade is unique and has no counterpart throughout the Nation or world. It commemorates the founding of the Sunday School Union of the Brooklyn Protestant Churches and was extended into Queens County. It is a gala occasion and we of that community can be justly proud of this public demonstration especially in these days when moral rearmament is so necessary.

If I were not compelled to remain here in Washington it would be my happy privilege to join with them.

For over 100 years the members of the Sunday School Union have thus manifested their moral qualities, and Brooklyn, the city of churches, can proclaim to the country that its citizens continue to be law-abiding and God-fearing.

To the many churches and men, women, and children participating in today's parade, and on behalf of the Members of the entire House of Representatives may I extend our best wishes and trust that their day will be observed with increasing numbers for many more years. [Applause.]

PUBLIC WORKS FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, this is a time when decent concern on the part of every Member of the House for the general welfare of our Nation is certainly called for. America has got to become the master of her own destiny, and our job is to make her so.

Our Constitution provides that Congress shall coin money and regulate its value. We have let that power slip out of the hands of Congress, out of the hands of any governmental agency, and into the hands of a private financial system. If we really want our free economic system to survive, Congress has got to take back that power and see that it is exercised in the public interest rather than a private one.

Today I shall not discuss the larger aspects of this question. I want to talk about a simple measure which could be passed by this Congress and which would do one thing only-stop the business of borrowing bank credit through the "sale" of Government bonds to obtain funds for selfliquidating Federal projects or self-liquidating loans to local governments, and substitute for that system a sound use of national credit for such secured advances without any increase whatsoever in the public debt.

On May 4, 1938, I first introduced a bill to create a Public Works Finance Corporation and to give it power under congressional direction to finance directly by means of national credit, self-liquidating public works and self-liquidating secured loans to public bodies. That same bill was reintroduced in this Congress and its number is H. R. 115. I have sent a copy to every Member of the House along with certain explanatory material.

At present we are paying for every schoolhouse, every hospital, every dam, every such national improvement twice We pay for it once when it is first built and when wages are paid, materials bought, and so on. We pay for it again when we pay interest on an absolutely unnecessary debt contracted through the sale of bonds for privately created bank credit. The Public Works Finance Act would render such bond sales unnecessary and would permit the sovereign Government of America to create credit to finance secured advances for public works in precisely the same manner as any private bank would now finance such advances. The bank does not have to sell bonds and borrow credit when it "buys" bonds of a State, city, or the Federal Government. It creates the credit for this purpose. Why then should not the sovereign Government of America exercise that same right and power? That question evidently answers itself. [Applause.]

In his testimony before the Temporary Economic National—"Monopoly"—Committee Mr. A. A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State, whose testimony I am asking to include in full in today's RECORD, had this to say in conclusion:

It seems to me that the T. N. E. C. can now, and should, promptly recommend three things:

First, that there be drawn, passed, and put into operation a bill creating a Public Works Finance Corporation, with suitably guarded rediscount privileges at the Federal Reserve bank. This would make it possible for the self-liquidating public-works agencies of the United States Government to finance directly, instead of through a Federal project. Like privileges could be extended to the municipalities and local units, so that housing, hospitals, and other necessary local improvements could be carried on, and other necessary local improvements could be carried on, without reference to the Federal project. Such institutions could quote any rate of interest which was necessary to get the business done. The rate of interest ought to be almost nil in a nonprofit enterprise like a hospital, and running up to commercial rates in a straight business proposition.

While I am of the opinion that our monetary system needs a very thorough revision, I would like to review briefly this most logical and necessary immediate step in the forward march of democracy. Our whole Nation desperately needs a renewed sense of security. It needs to provide against unemployment. It must offer constructive work opportunities to all its people either in private industry, or, if that is impossible, in such Government work as will directly attack our two great national problems of the rapid exhaustion of our natural resources and the persistence of the slum. If every American businessman could be certain that all of the American working population would be continuously employed, he would immediately see new hope for the future and be ready to expand his output. The problem which confronts us is the financing of a program of this sort without a continuous increase in the national debt. Some of the monetary reforms which I believe to be absolutely essential to continuance of our free economy may take time to accomplish. But there is one thing which we can do right now. That is to declare our Government free of the necessity of purchasing from private creators of credit the right to lend and use its own credit and to have our Government begin to lend directly upon the most substantial credit base in the world-that of the United States Government-whenever proper security is offered by a public body. For the purpose of advancing credit for public works to States and counties, and for the purpose of financing the self-liquidating portion of any Federal public works which may be undertaken, this method should be used.

Under the provisions of H. R. 115, an agency of government called the Public Works Finance Corporation would be created with power to issue up to $5,000,000,000 of bonds bearing a rate of interest 1 percent less than the going Federal rate. These bonds would all be sold to and held until retired by the Treasury of the United States, which would thus receive as net income the interest paid by the Public Works Finance Corporation upon its bonds. The Treasury would buy these bonds with a direct extension of its own credit.

This Corporation is then empowered to buy the securities of States, counties, or local governmental subdivisionswhich are required to bear only the going Federal rate of interest-if such securities are issued for the purpose of financing puble works of a useful character. The Corporation is further empowered to make advances and loans to any public-works project, Federal, State, or local, where the revenues are to be sufficient to pay back the cost with interest at the going Federal rate. Such loans are, of course, to be secured by liens against project revenues.

This Public Works Finance Act thus places the Government of the United States in a position to finance public works without increasing the national debt or having to raise funds by taxes. How is this possible? Simply by having the Treasury of the United States employ exactly the same device of credit creation when it buys the bonds of the Public Works Finance Corporation as the banks have heretofore employed in buying Government bonds. It is just as sound, just as reasonable, just as workable as the present system. The only difference is that the people of America derive the direct benefits, and all of them, from this creation of credit, which amounts today to the creation of money.

H. R. 115 places upon the Public Works Finance Corporation responsibility for surveying the whole employment situation in the Nation and so conducting its business as to increase stability of the price level and bring about full employment. The bill further takes the first step toward providing this Nation with a sensible, businesslike Budget.

Section 12 of H. R. 115 reads as follows:

SEC. 12. The Corporation shall submit annually a report to the Congress covering the works of the Corporation for the preceding year and including such information, data, and recommendations for further appropriation or legislation in connection with the matfor further appropriation or legislation in connection with the matters covered by this act as it may find advisable, including a financial statement showing (1) the par value of the outstanding bonds of the Corporation; (2) the amount of funds made available by the Corporation to any State or any political subdivision thereof by loan, acquisition of securities, or otherwise; (3) the assets held by the Corporation as a result of such loans, acquisitions of securities, etc., and the income, if any, from such assets; (4) the amount of funds made available by the Corporation for the financing of Federal self-liquidating projects; (5) the capital value of such projects and the income derived and anticipated to be derived from them: (6) the expenditures of all Federal Government agencies for them; (6) the expenditures of all Federal Government agencies for projects which have resulted in the creation of new capital assets public in character, whether or not such projects produce revenue; and (7) the actual or estimated value of such new capital assets.

Thus we would at least have the information upon which we could set up an accounting of capital outlay and capital assets of the United States, alongside our accounting of current receipts and expenditures. We would thus get a truer picture of the financial conditions of our Government than we can possibly have now.

Thus this bill, though admittedly offering no complete solution to our economic problem, would make it entirely possible for our Government to act quickly and positively in checking unemployment at any time, and without an increase in debt. The Public Works Finance Corporation would be informed by all governmental agencies of any facts they might possess concerning unemployment, the price level, people employed on public works, the type of projects being carried on, and the need of the Nation for various sorts of public works, and all other important facts bearing on the employment problem of the Nation. On the basis of these facts the Corporation would determine its policies and the extent to which it would at any time make funds available for housing, reclamation, power development, reforestation, or any other type of public work.

Since large amounts of excess reserves might accumulate in the banks through the use of this national credit by the Public Works Finance Corporation, the bill broadens the power of the Federal Reserve Board to control reserves by removing the present limitation placed upon that power. This provision coupled with the proposed credit activities of the Public Works Finance Corporation would make possible a ready transition to a system of 100 percent reserves behind all demand deposits. The bill empowers the Federal Reserve Board to instruct the Federal Reserve Banks to purchase assets of member banks if at any time any such bank finds itself in need of additional reserves to bring them up to the legal requirements.

No fair-minded person will, I think, suggest that the measures I have proposed do violence to a single one of the values Americans hold dear. On the contrary, the preservation of our system of free economic enterprise could, by these means, be coupled with an opportunity for constructive employment on the part of all. In place of the necessity of intricate systems of Government regulation of business by rules of law we would have in the hands of Government a constructive tool whereby it could, in the interest of all the people in America, directly and of its own volition, bring about the expansion of enterprise and the full production of wealth for which all of us have hoped so long. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

THE BRITISH WAR DEBT

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I read to the House a telegram I sent to the White House a few moments ago:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 8, 1939.

KING GEORGE VI, White, House, Washington, D. C .:

Because London dispatches have characterized your visit to the United States as an official one I believe that I am acting within the boundaries of propriety in demanding as a representative of the people in the Congress of the United States that you publicly state what your Government intends to do about payment of war debt due this Nation in the sum of approximately five and one-half bil-lion dollars. If your Government can continue to spend a few billion dollars each year for armaments, continue to subsidize the construction of supersteamships like the Queen Mary and the Queen Elizabeth, do you not think it is the decent thing to give some consideration to the obligation you owe the United States of America, whose assistance in the last World War made possible the continuation of your Majesty's Government as a world power? Respectfully, MARTIN L. SWEENEY, Member of Congress.

[Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

THE LATE WILL ROGERS

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Speaker, I was, unfortunately, unable to be present at the unveiling of the statue of my long-time friend, Will Rogers. On yesterday I had an opportunity to see the handicraft and the realistic reproduction and likeness of our loved departed friend, and I take this occasion to call attention to the true human values and the real results of living a life of service among one's friends, true to one's family and one's country, as symbolized in the case of my departed friend, Will Rogers.

I take occasion at this moment to call solemn attention to the deep conviction I feel as a student of history that no man whose name is indicated on the pages involving the chronology of human events, save our Saviour's, was as well loved, as widely loved by as many, as was the name of my departed friend, Will Rogers. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief statement made by Msgr. John A. Ryan, director, social action, of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, and also to extend my own remarks on the subject of immigration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address of the Honorable James A. Farley, Postmaster General of the United States, at the annual convention of the Nebraska Chapter of the National Association of Postmasters on May 24, 1939, at Omaha, Nebr.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLaughlin]?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object-Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, again we have a speech of Jim Farley. It seems to me that every day and every day we are going further away and further away from good, sound, sensible government. If we are going to continue to put the speeches of Jim Farley in the RECORD while he is making a tour of the country as Postmaster General, and you are doing it under the Democratic administration, how are you going to ever pay the debt that we are creating by putting all of Jim Farley's speeches in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLaughlin]?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader concerning the program for the week and when we will get to a vote on the social-security bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is the intention and the determination to complete the social-security bill this week, including a final vote, whether that be Friday or Saturday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. That means we will be in session on Saturday, if necessary, to get to a final vote?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How long is it intended to run today?

Mr. RAYBURN. We hope to complete general debate. I do not think there are enough Members of the House who will be called away to affect a quorum. I believe a sufficient number of Members will be here to maintain a quorum in order to complete general debate.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. So far as the Republicans are concerned, so very few of them have been invited that we cannot keep a quorum from being present, so far as this side is concerned.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and to include therein a letter written by the mother of one of the boys rescued from the Squalus.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the question of national old-age pensions and to include therein two tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Wolcott]?

There was no objection.

THE DU PONT FAMILY

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. On Tuesday of this week reference was made on the floor of the House to a letter which Mr. Lammot du Pont recently addressed to the stockholders, employees, and friends of E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. The State of Delaware, which I represent, is pleased to claim not only Mr. Lammot du Pont but other members of the Du Pont family as its most honorable and valuable citizens. The accomplishment of this family during almost 200 years has contributed very much to the establishment and growth of our great country during that time and will continue to help keep our country such as was intended by our founding fathers. So that the advice and judgment of Mr. du Pont may be available at this time to my colleagues and the citizens of our country in these most critical times I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may extend my remarks by including in the RECORD the letter referred to calling attention to the Government financial position.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

E. I. DU PONT DE NEMOURS & Co., INC., Wilmington, Del., May 24, 1939.

To Stockholders, Employees, and Friends of E I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.:

THE GOVERNMENT FINANCIAL POSITION

Under date of April 8, 1932, I sent you a letter calling attention to the extraordinary increase in expenditures by our National Government, between the relatively prosperous year 1927 and the year 1932, which later proved to be the bottom of the depression.

year 1932, which later proved to be the bottom of the depression. The following statements were made:

"To finance these ever-increasing disbursements, Congress is now planning huge additional taxes to be paid for out of the already shrunken income of prostrate industry and individuals.

"Taxes levied upon corporations and other producers increase the cost of their products. Higher costs lessen sales, slow down industry, increase unemployment and want; all of which drive costs still higher and further increase distress.

"Taxes upon individuals have a similar effect by curtailing their capacity to purchase the products of industry.

"It is lower costs and higher purchasing power which we need today, perhaps more than ever in our history. Why are industries and individuals, which must reduce their expenditures to meet the depressed conditions, saddled with ever-mounting taxes to cover the ever-increasing expenditures of the National Government? Why should confidence in the financial security of the Government itself be jeopardized by extravagance? Why does not Congress balance the national Budget by reduction of expenditures, through efficient operation and the curtailment of non-essential services and functions?"

What has happened since 1932 is shown by the following

figures:

	Federal Government expenditures — fiscal years ending June 30 (millions of dollars)—			Increase (percent)
	1927	1932	1939 1	1927- 32	1932- 39	1927- 39
Total expenditures Less interest and debt retirement 2	$3, 494 1, 121	$4, 948 1, 012	$9, 592 1, 076	+42	+94	+175
Balance of expenditures	2, 373	3, 936	8, 516	+66	+116	+259

President's Budget estimate of Jan. 5, 1939.
 Includes only $100,000,000 for debt retirement in 1939 versus $413,000,000 in 1932 and $520,000,000 in 1937, while the 1939 direct debt will be about $41,000,000,000 as compared with $18,500,000,000 in 1927.

and $520,000,000 in 1927, while the 1939 direct debt will be about $41,000,000,000 as compared with $18,500,000,000 in 1927.

In 1932 we were justly appalled by the tremendous increase in Government expenditures which had taken place since 1927; but now our total annual expenditures (excluding interest and debt retirement) are more than double the 1932 figures and more than three and a half times the 1927 figures!

Our total Federal expenditures, excluding Post Office expenses, for the 7 years from July 1, 1932, to June 30, 1939, will amount to more than $53,000,000,000. This is twice as much as the National Government spent from the time of its creation in 1789 to the end of the fiscal year 1916—a period of 127 years, which included all of our wars prior to the World War.

This astounding increase in the annual rate of expenditure has taken place during a time when the average national income has been subnormal. The result has been that during the last 7 years the Federal Government has spent 13½ percent of the total national income produced, as against less than 6 percent during the preceding 10 years. All forms of government in the United States for the past 2 years have been spending around 30 percent of the national income, as compared with 14.5 percent in 1929.

These huge expenditures have been made largely in the name of emergency—to provide relief and to induce recovery. But the commonly accepted estimates show almost as many people unemployed now as in 1933. And no wonder. The very method adopted obviously defeated its own end.

The tremendous debt created and the heavy tax burden required have prevented the development of the confidence necessary to resuscitate the capital-goods industries and to induce the creation available for use in new enterprises is being paralyzed by fear and rapidly confiscated through the heavy burden of taxes.

The tremendous debt created and the heavy tax burden required have prevented the development of the confidence necessary to resuscitate the capital-goods industries and to induce the creation of new enterprises. Since the fiscal year 1932 the national debt, including "guaranteed" debt, has increased almost $25,000,000,000. Lasting confidence, necessary to free the capital-goods industries and to reemploy millions of people, cannot develop under such conditions. New capital cannot be created. Capital which remains available for use in new enterprises is being paralyzed by fear and rapidly confiscated through the heavy burden of taxes.

Our spending program has produced not recovery but paralysis and fear. Is it not high time that we discard this program, which bids fair to perpetuate our difficulties, and to return to the time-tested method of encouraging and fostering the free play of fundamental economic forces, of encouraging men to work and capital to produce? Is it not evident that in this way only can true recovery be brought about? be brought about?

It seems appropriate again to use substantially the same words of the closing paragraph of my letter to you under date of April 8, 1932, which were as follows:

"The ways and means of curtailing governmental expenditures are the responsibility of Congress. * * * The future of industry and employment will be affected by your action. If you feel as I do, why not make your feeling known immediately to your political representatives (in Congress), directly, through your friends, your newspapers, your chambers of commerce, your trade associations, or other groups or individuals in a position to impress Congress."

Personally, I feel that your Senators and Congressmen will welcome your expression of opinion on this all-important subject. They know full well the importance of prompt action on this matter. They know the dire consequences if such action is not taken.

They know the dire consequences if such action is not taken.

L. DU PONT, President.

THE GOVERNOR OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico [Mr. IGLESIAS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Mr. Speaker, the President has sent to the Senate the name of Admiral William D. Leahy to become Governor of Puerto Rico, to succeed the Honorable Blanton Winship, who has resigned.

The White House has given out a release containing the letters of Governor Winship and the answer of the President. I ask unanimous consent that the same may be included as a part of my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to follow:

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: At the time of my last conference with you in Washington I indicated that I should like to terminate my duties as Governor of Puerto Rico at a time that would be appropriate and convenient for you. I had entertained the expectation for a year to ask for my relief, but for different reasons had postponed

Some time ago I accepted an invitation to attend the Conference of Governors at Albany, N. Y., from June 26 to 29, inclusive. After that I intend to go to New York City to inspect the Puerto Rican offices there and the Puerto Rican exhibit at the World's Fair. This will require only a few days, and I then plan to go to Washington to confer with Admiral Leahy, who has written me that he would like to discuss the affairs of Puerto Rico with me.

I think it appropriate to make my final annual report before leaving office and have asked all heads of departments to have their reports in without fail by July 15. In the meantime, I shall practically have completed my report, subject to any changes that might be suggested by the reports from the different departments. This work should be completed by the last of July. If it meets with your approval, I will then take leave, subject to call, until Admiral Leahy plans to arrive. This can be arranged at your and his convenience as far as my movements are concerned. I do not believe, however, that it will be necessary for me to return to Puerto Rico after going on leave in Washington. after going on leave in Washington.

Permit me to say that I was deeply gratified over your selection of Admiral Leahy to succeed me. He will certainly make a splendid

In leaving office I want to express to you my deep appreciation of your kindness and many courtesies and assure you of the con-tinuance of the admiration and affection that I have entertained for you throughout the years. Faithfully yours,

BLANTON WINSHIP, Governor.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR WINSHIP: I have received your resignation of June 3, 1939, which I accept, knowing of your desire to be relieved as soon as convenient. As I have already indicated to you, Admiral Leahy will be able to assume the governorship on September I of this year, subject, of course, to his confirmation by the Senate. Therefore the arrangement of your time as outlined in your letter will fit in satisfactorily.

will fit in satisfactorily.

I am sure that you already know of my high regard for you personally and officially, but I cannot refrain at this time from expressing my appreciation of your long and distinguished career in the service of your Government. This applies not only to your work in Puerto Rico but to other special and difficult assignments that you have had previously and which so remarkably equipped you for the governorship of Puerto Rico. You took office there at a most difficult moment in the history of the island; you inherited problems of unique and unprecedented gravity. I am proud of the way in which you carried through this most arduous task in the interest of the people of Puerto Rico. interest of the people of Puerto Rico.

May I thank you for your loyal support during the years we have known each other and express my best wishes for the future.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short letter received from an Indian.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting in the RECORD a statement of Senator Vandenberg, of Michigan, on his stand regarding the national home in Palestine, which appeared in the Detroit Jewish Chronicle.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EMPLOYEES OF GOVERNMENT INSTITUTIONS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have just filed with the Clerk of the House a petition, No. 16, to discharge the Committee on Veterans' Legislation from further consideration of H. R. 2402, providing for the abolishment of the practice of making compulsory deductions from the pay of employees of Government institutions for quarters, subsistence, and laundry, regardless of whether employees avail themselves of these facilities.

This unfair and undemocratic practice should be abolished, Mr. Speaker, and I take this occasion to urge every Member of this Congress who sincerely desires to assist in bringing about improved living conditions for Government employees to sign this petition.

Many thousand Federal employees are now being forced to support families on less than W. P. A. wages because of this unfair practice, which the Veterans' Bureau has refused to correct, although some exceptions have been recently made. Many of these employees are former service men.

The bill that I have offered has been before the Veterans' Committee without action since this session of Congress convened. It will abolish these compulsory pay deductions and at the same time require Government agencies to charge only cost for the facilities utilized. It is meritorious legislation and should be given the consideration of the Congress. I again urge all Members, on both sides of the House, to assist me in my efforts to obtain this consideration. [Applause.]

OLD-AGE BENEFIT PENSIONS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, old-age benefit pensions of $60 a month should be paid to the needy aged of our country. The Townsend bill (H. R. 6466), according to the estimates of social-security experts, would have provided only $31 a month for the aged. Dr. Townsend himself felt that only $50 a month for the old people would be realized under his latest plan.

I propose that an increase in grants for old-age assistance be given by the Federal Government which will provide payments to the needy aged up to $60 per month. The Federal Government will, in accordance with the law, reimburse the States for 50 percent of their assistance payments to the needy aged. It is estimated by the Social Security Administration that the cost of increasing old-age benefit payments from $30 a month to $40 a month will be about $5,000,000 to $10,000,000 per year, depending upon the extent to which the States take advantage of the new proposal. In proportion the cost of increasing the payments from $30 a month to $60 a month will be about $15,000,000 to $30,000,000 a year.

In my estimation something must be done at once to keep our old people in some degree of comfort with needed food, clothing, and shelter. This Congress has appropriated billions of dollars, much of it having been squandered in unnecessary projects. I would much rather urge the appropriation of $30,000,000 to provide pensions of $60 a month to the aged needy than spend $100,000,000 for a battleship. [Ap-

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a letter addressed by myself to a constituent in connection with the Townsend vote and my views on social-security liberalization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

JUNE 2. 1939.

Mr. P. V. WATSON

Townsend Club No. 1, Keyser, W. Va.

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: Replying to your day letter of May 31, let me say that the Townsend bill was defeated in the House today by a vote of 97 to 302. I am sorry to say that I could not conscientiously support this legislation.

I feel that there should be a liberalized pension with increased amounts being paid by both Federal and State Governments. I feel that the age limit should be lowered from 65 to 60. When I voted for the Social Security Act I realized that it was only a beginning in our efforts to bring about aid to the aged, assistance to the unemployed, and benefits to the crippled and blind. The Ways and Means Committee of the House has been holding extensive hearings on this subject and I understand that liberalized amendments to this act will be brought before the House for action next week.

You may be sure these amendments will receive my active cooperation and support.

Very sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

USE OF NET WEIGHT IN COTTON TRANSACTIONS

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill (H. R. 57) to provide for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign commerce transactions in cotton, to provide for the standardization of bale covering for cotton, and for other purposes. The Clerk will read the engrossed copy of the bill.

The Clerk read the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and seventy-one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit. The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CLASON. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Clason moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture with instructions to report out a bill to provide solely for the use of net weights in interstate and foreign commerce transactions in cotton.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to re-

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Clason) there were—ayes 22 and noes 137.

Mr. CLASON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6635) to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6635, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, this bill has a great deal of merit. If properly amended it will be the means of alleviating a good share of the distress in this country. I have always been, and still am, committed to the principles of the Townsend bill. I think I have always understood the objectives which Dr. Townsend has in mind in his efforts to enact that program into law.

The purpose of the Townsend program is so much more far-reaching than this act, that there is in fact but little similarity. The Townsend program was one of national recovery-it was not limited to aid to the old people of this country, but was designed to put enough purchasing power down at the grass roots of this Nation to revive business in every section of it, and automatically bring jobs to the millions now in idleness. A great number of Congressmen never considered the national recovery feature of the Townsend program. Without the building up of purchasing power in the hands of the millions who want and cannot satisfy those wants, I for one, fail to see where our recovery can possibly take place.

In this act we have before us a mere program of relief. Whether we amend the present law or whether we do not, the old people of this country have presented to them a mere program of relief. We can either take care of them through this so-called pension act, or we can take care of them under general relief-we must take care of them.

While this act is not a recovery act in any sense, we can at least make it a humanitarian relief measure and take it out of the class of a miserable starving dole as the law operates today.

Experience with the present social security law has established some facts which should guide us in our present

First. That the amounts paid to the aged have been so inadequate that there has, in fact, been no pension at all, but merely a dole.

Second. The law has not been operated as a decent dole, for a dole is a gift and no gifts were made to the aged under this law if they possessed any tangible piece of property. If an old couple, an old man, or an old lady possessed what they called their home-some instances the actual value was not over $200, no benefits could be received under this law until the property was deeded over to the State administration.

Many cases have come under my personal observation where an old couple had, through the years, saved enough to possess a modest home, not exceeding in value $2,000, but while possessing the home, they were destitute of everything else. I found that a man can starve in his own home as easily as anywhere else if he has no food. I found a man can freeze to death in his own home in North Dakota if he cannot obtain fuel to burn. A man can get as ragged in his own home as he can anywhere if he has nothing with which to make clothes.

Still this was their home-home means a lot to most people. Eugene Field says, "It takes a heap of living in a house to make it home." Why should we pass a law that will permit any State in distributing Federal funds, to exact a deed to any home of people found to be in need of help? Leave these little homes alone. Leave what little property they have alone-let us put this program on a higher plane than that of a beggar's mite.

Third. We have failed to offer any direct Government assistance to any old person. We have offered aid if and when the State is willing to match funds. Some States could not match funds to any adequate extent and for that reason the aged have been without aid. We should not put our stamp of approval on a bill to be known as a bill passed by the Congress of the United States and make it contingent on what some State is willing to do. If this is national aid it should be distributed that way. I have no objection to having a State pass upon the qualification of an applicant, but when certified by the State as a proper applicant the Federal funds should go direct to that individual regardless of what a State is willing or wants to do. In my judgment the Federal payment should be equal to all persons in the United States and Territories and should carry a minimum payment of $20 per month.

Fourth. The States can then take up the work from that point and finish up the job. The people of North Dakota have been hard hit in the last few years-more devastating interference with normal crop production than any State in the Union, and this has been continuous for 9 years, but North Dakota can finish out the payments to the aged if we will authorize a minimum payment of $20, and a special election is being called now in North Dakota to pass upon $40 per month. This would mean that North Dakota, herself, will have to raise $20 per month if we pass this minimum Federal allowance of $20 per month.

Fifth. Geography is not material when distress is abroad. Old people have been shunted around among relatives here and there and because of that they have found that in most cases they could not receive any aid payments, because they were not domiciled when the applications were made. They would have to continuously reside in Pedunk, Posey County, Whippole Township, Ind., if they received any aid from Indiana and this Government. Federal payments, too, should be made to any citizen of the United States who is qualified to receive aid regardless of where he is domiciled. We cannot say what the States will do, because we cannot legislate for them, but we can say that it is immaterial to the Government where the citizen resides.

If any general recovery to the business of the country is to come from this act, it will come exactly in proportion to the amount of money spread out as buying power among the people who will buy. If Members feel that a minimum payment of $20 is too much, just remember two things: A. If matched by the States, the entire amount would be $40. and I ask you if you think there is any more in this combined allowance than to sustain life. There can be no purchases made of clothing, medical attention, proper housing, and other necessary things to sustain an American standard of living. Even if you believe there will be more than enough to sustain a slender thread of life, remember that anything spent in excess of this will go directly into the purchasing power of the Nation which now does not exist.

As I stated in the beginning, this is not a recovery program—it is a relief program and therefore let us make the provisions of it liberal enough to take care of the aged of the United States out of the category of an abject and starving dole.

I, for one, do not expect this bill to approach the benefits to all of the people, as would have been the case in the Townsend program, but we could not pass the Townsend recovery program-too many Congressmen could not see in it the recovery of the Nation-they hung onto the proposition that the aged could live on less than a maximum of $200 per month and deliberately ignored the recovery features of the bill; too many other Congressmen betrayed the voters of their districts. When candidates have pledged themselves to support the voters in what the voters want, and having received their votes and having been elected, I say it is outright deception to come into this body and take the opposite stand. Such conduct destroys the people's confidence in representative government. I can find no objection to a Representative who opposed the Townsend bill in the open, giving the people of his district the opportunity to know what he would do if elected. When such a Representative voted "no" on the bill, he carried out honestly the philosophy he believed in, and his action did not shake public confidence in Congress. But where candidates appeared before audiences and promised faithfully to aid in this program, and then, at the crucial time, deserted that cause, I say such action is reprehensible. Where candidates wrote letters and signed them pledging their support to the Townsend recovery program, and by so doing received the Townsend support, and were accordingly elected, their duty was plain. To then desert the people upon the first roll call can have no other effect than to weaken the confidence of millions in representative government.

On this bill, cannot we all agree that we owe a duty to the aged of this country to treat them better than paupers and beggars? If reelection is what most of you want, can you be defeated on the issue of taking a determined stand to help the aged of the United States? If that is the only issue, your position will be as strong as the concrete at Gibraltareven the most conservative men who believe we should balance the Budget and let the people starve, cannot work up courage enough to attack you on that position. Let us think this bill through; forget our political affiliations and do a worthy thing to protect those who have made this Nation great and who have made it possible for us to sit here in judgment over the destinies of 130,000,000 people. Let us today restore confidence in representative government. Let us liberalize this bill and make it workable; let us say to our fathers and mothers for the short span of years they are to remain on earth, they shall not be haunted by the black vulture of want, hunger, and rags; that they shall not be driven "over the hill to the poor house," but they shall remain at home under the protecting care of the great Government which they built and which we mean to perpetuate. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Poage].

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to direct the attention of the House to the amendment of title 1 of the Social Security Act. On page 2, line 17, of the printed bill you will find a subsection (7) which reads as follows:

(7) Effective July 1, 1941, provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance, and

This language is substituted for the following, which is in the act at the present time:

And (7) provide that if the State or any of its political subdivisions collects from the estate of any recipient of old-age assistance any amount with respect to old-age assistance furnished him under the plan, one-half of the net amount so collected shall be promptly paid to the United States. Any payment so made shall be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation for the purposes of this title.

Actually, under this provision of the present law, the Treasurer has collected only $921,172.85 from the effective date of the bill up to April 30, 1939. It seems to me that the present law is based on the sound principle that in those rather isolated instances where the State actually collects funds as a reimbursement for expenditures made by it, no matter how small, that the Federal Government should share on in the same ratio as it shares in the disbursements. Certainly, one cannot find fault with this principle, and I can see no need for its repeal. However, as a practical matter, the collections under this provision are so small as to be almost meaningless. I therefore feel that we need not be disturbed at the removal of this section from the present law.

The implications contained in the language of the new section (7) are, however, a matter of grave concern to those of us who have heretofore witnessed the disruption of State pension plans by the administrative regulations of the Social Security Board. This section is new to the Federal act, but it involves a problem that is far from new in my home State.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. POAGE. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I think I am correct in advising the gentleman that an entirely different matter was in mind with respect to this provision. The gentleman would not take the position, I am sure, that a person should receive old-age assistance or an old-age pension if he is also eligible for and is receiving an old-age annuity under title II.

Mr. POAGE. Certainly not.

Mr. COOPER. Under the present title II old-age annuities do not go into effect until 1942, but under this bill title II benefits or old-age annuities go into effect in 1940. Therefore if a person is receiving title II benefits, or old-age annuities, that certainly should be considered by the State agency before they should be granted an old-age pension or old-age assistance under title I.

Mr. POAGE. I quite agree with the gentleman as to the desirability of that procedure, and I did not know the reason for placing it in here, and I appreciate the gentleman's explanation, because I think it is perfectly sound; but I do think that a limitation intended to meet the situation described by the gentleman should have a limitation in it to provide that the "other income" referred to should not be from a Government annuity or from any other form of public aid. In other words, I agree that we should not pay two pensions to the same individual. But, as I understand this provision as it is now written, it would open up in every State in the Union a thing that in my State has been the greatest source of trouble since we have had an old-age assistance law, and that is the matter commonly referred to in Texas as "child support."

Mr. Chairman, in 1935 I was a member of the Texas Senate. Our legislature was called into extraordinary session for the purpose of writing a State old-age assistance law in conformity with the Federal Social Security Act. At that time the entire subject of old-age assistance was new and we were working without the benefit of much experience to The bill brought out by a committee of that body guide us. and considered by the State senate at that time contained a provision expressly authorizing the authorities in determining the need of an applicant, to take into consideration the ability and willingness of the component members of the applicant's immediate family to contribute to his support. At that time I entertained the fear that this language would be used as a basis for denying aid to our old people on the ground that-not they, but someone else, albeit a childpossessed some property or income; and at that time I offered an amendment to that State legislation to strike this provision from the bill. The law under which the Texas oldage assistance program was developed contained no reference to the ability of children to support an applicant, but this item soon became the chief object of the case workers' investigations. The only basis for or justification of this procedure has arisen from the interpretation of the requirement that the applicant be in "necessitous circumstances." We thought that under this act the State would be the judge of the need of an applicant, but we were to soon find that our own ideas of need had little to do with the actual administration of the program. Ostensibly in the hands of local people our program has been controlled by the interpretations and investigations of the "approved" social service consultants which the Social Security Board has forced upon us. And these people have in almost every case taken the unreasonable attitude that no matter how destitute an old person or an old couple might be, that their evident need was no basis of certification to the pension rolls if perchance any child made even a small contribution to their support.

The situation became so bad and the abuse so flagrant that removal of the so-called child support requirements from our law became the outstanding and overshadowing political issue in my State. I say it became a political issue. Really it became the political theme song of every campaign. No one opposed it, at least not in the openeveryone favored the change. A frenzy of righteous resentment swept the State. Of course, demagogues took advantage of the feelings of the people and promised every conceivable benefit no matter how fantastic. Agitators went up and down the State telling the needy old people that by joining certain organizations or by voting for certain candidates that everyone would be given altogether unattainable retirement pensions-and often the promise was coupled with the even more impossible promise that the payments would be made without any increase in taxes. There was some rivalry as to who would promise the most for the least, but there has been, and is no substantial disagreement in my State that the old people should be given aid, within the limits of the ability of society to pay the bill, wherever they are without means or income of their own to support themselves. Our legislature has been in session since the first of January. It has been unable to agree on many things. It has never been able to muster a majority of both its houses for a proposal to adequately tax the great natural resources of our State, but it has agreed that it should proclaim in unambiguous terms the determination of the people of Texas to grant aid to all the needy aged regardless of the status of the applicant's children. Such a bill has passed the Texas Legislature and was just last week signed by our Governor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. POAGE. Surely.

Mr. COOPER. After all, the gentleman will bear in mind that this is a State-administered program so far as old-age assistance is concerned and whatever the State wants to provide along that line is entirely a matter for the State. Mr. POAGE. It should be.

Mr. COOPER. The Federal Government simply says to the State, "You work out your program as you think the people of your State ought to have it and we will match dollar for dollar what you do for your people up to not exceeding $15 a month." That is the present law.

Mr. POAGE. And should be the law from now on out, but I do not understand that this provision leaves the law in that way, nor am I so sure that that is the practical working of this law at this time. That is the letter of the law and it should be administered in that spirit. I think the gentleman is exactly correct in saying the State should have the same power in the future that it has theoretically had in the past. and that is what I hope they will have, but as I understand this very provision it enables the Social Security Board to. and they undoubtedly would through their regulations, go into the States and compel the States to adopt their interpretation or else lose the Federal contribution, and therefore it does not leave it within the hands of the State. I am just as anxious about that as the gentleman from Tennessee, and my purpose on this floor is to see that the State has the opportunity to determine within its borders who shall be the recipients of old-age assistance, and where the State is putting up its proportion of the money, it certainly should have that right. Of course, if we were dealing with a pension paid entirely by the Federal Government there would be justification for the control of all details of the pension by the Federal Government. In fact, I have been working on a pension bill for months, and I have about come to the conclusion that we will be forced to finally abandon our present dual system and recognize that the Federal Government must assume the full burden. When this is done, control of the system should pass with its burden.

But even if we were considering a pension system fully supported by the Federal Government I should still fear this new section 7 as it is drawn. I fear that it will be used at a future date to work an injustice on the old people of the United States. Let us not repeat and multiply by 48 the mistakes of the Texas pension law. Let us rather profit by the experience of the past. Let us strike out of this bill anything that might at a later date be used as a basis of unfair discrimination.

I have prepared an amendment to strike out the words "and resources" with the idea that unless these words are deleted they will at some future time be interpreted as including more than the personal income and property of the applicant himself and will be tortured into a warrant to deny some needy old person the aid to which he is entitled and which I want him to get. I find, however, that there are a number of other Members who have prepared similar amendments, and doubtless in view of the statement of the able gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] as to the purpose of the committee in insisting on this subsection, it may be desirable for several of those interested in the clarification of this item to get together and support one amendment combining the ideas of several individuals. shall be glad to do just as I was glad this morning to join with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer] and with many other members who had amendments of their own to broaden the base of Federal participation in pension funds, and to unite our efforts behind one amendment for this purpose. I believe that the Federal Government should contribute a larger share of the money spent for old-age assistance, at least up to a reasonable figure. Probably the percentage of Federal grant or contribution should be graduated with a smaller percent granted where the payments per individual are greater. I believe that any additional aid that the Federal Government can extend to the States in this matter should come at the bottom through a grant of a larger part of the total cost so that more people might go on the rolls, and so those now on the roll but who are getting the smallest payments could have their payments raised, rather than at the top by granting a State more money so that it could increase its higher bracket of payments from $30 to $40 per month. Such an increase will not reach those drawing the average or less than average payments—the very people who need help most. I had therefore prepared an amendment to give this aid to the States for use in helping those at the bottom. I find, however, that Members who have had more experience in Congress than I have already prepared similar amendments. I therefore expect to go along with them rather than to insist on my own amendment. What I want is to get results. I know that we will be more likely to get the desired results if we all work together in support of one amendment than if each of us insists on his own special amendment. I shall therefore follow this policy both as to subsection (7) and as to the percentage of Federal grant. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity to propound one or two questions to the chairman of the committee. On page 17 of the report at the bottom of the page the following appears:

In order to eliminate the nuisance of inconsequential tax payments, the bill excludes certain services performed for fraternal benefit societies and other nonprofit institutions exempt from income tax.

I have received many letters from small community clubs, chambers of commerce, whose officers are not paid a salary or any kind of a stipend whatsoever, in respect to this statement. I am wondering if the chairman could tell me if this statement I have just read where it refers to the other nonprofit institutions takes care of those chambers of commerce?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I think I can say to the gentleman that that situation is taken care of. I do not think the gentleman or anyone else could have been any more anxious or determined to take care of that very situation than those of us on the committee. We certainly devoted as much time and attention to that as any other one thing, and it is our assurance and our understanding that that situation is taken care of.

Mr. STEFAN. I am glad the gentleman assures me of that fact, because I had intended to offer two amendments to take care of some of those nonprofit institutions.

Mr. COOPER. I think if the gentleman will carefully examine the language on page 38 of the bill he will find that that situation is taken care of.

Mr. STEFAN. One other question. I have been asked by many people in my district, old people, as to an insurance policy and owning their own homes. Are they eliminated from the benefits of the old-age pensions provided in this particular bill, or is that a question that is entirely up to the States? Do the States have the entire responsibility, and is it for the States to make the rules and regulations?

Mr. COOPER. That is a matter that is entirely up to the States.

Mr. STEFAN. I am also assured, am I not, that we have increased the child care benefits?

Mr. COOPER. In aid to dependent children under existing law the Federal Government puts up one-third.

Mr. STEFAN. And we have increased that to 50 percent? Mr. COOPER. The Federal Government, under existing law, makes a grant to the States of one-third. This bill increases that grant from one-third to one-half.

Mr. STEFAN. I am very glad to hear that. My own people in my State are very grateful that the committee has seen fit to increase that child welfare to 50 percent instead of one-third.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank members of the Ways and Means Committee for assuring me that these amendments take care of the matters over which so many people in my district have registered concern. The officers of the Fremont and Columbus Chambers of Commerce, who have suggested the amendments which I proposed to offer, can now be assured that these amendments are not necessary and that the officers who receive no salary in these nonprofit organizations do not come under the provisions of this act.

I am also assured here that the one-third Federal aid for child welfare has been increased to one-half. This will mean an increase of from $21,304 to $32,844 for my State of Nebraska, and I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the officers of the Nebraska Legion Auxiliary groups who have written and telegraphed me will be cheered by that news. I hope that we can retain this amendment in the bill notwithstanding some of the opposition which now prevails. The child welfare work which has been done in my State is as important as the vocational rehabilitation work which I note is given an increased amount in this bill. I urge Members to retain the increases in both of these items.

Regarding the increased Federal aid for the aged I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I hope this will result in giving many of the old people in my district some increases in their pensions and also allow many others to secure some assistance. There are many old people in my district who today are not receiving old-age benefits, and I am hopeful that this increase will make it possible for those in charge of this work in my State to bring these needy old people into the old-age benefit column. I know there are States who do not match the Federal old-age funds. This bill provides that the Federal Government will match dollar for dollar up to $20 old-age benefit payments. This would mean that if the State of Nebraska matched the $20 offered by the Federal Government, it would be possible for our needy old people to receive at least $40 per month. That is, of course, if all of the needy old people in my State could be taken into the program and if sufficient funds could be raised in my State. At the present time my State does not match dollar for dollar our Federal contribution with the result that our needy old people do not receive a very large monthly pension. If this bill will in any way improve the amount paid to our old people and take in others who are in immediate need, I will gladly support it. The reason I propounded several questions regarding the various rules and regulations regarding payment of old-age pensions under the provisions of this act, Mr. Chairman, is because my personal knowledge is that many people in my State cannot qualify under existing regulations. I am told that the committee is not opposed to paying old-age pensions under this act to old people who own a little home or who have some life insurance or just a little of these wordly goods. But those in charge of this bill indicate that they have no control over these State rules and regulations and that these rules and regulations must be the responsibility of the various States. In some States, we are told here, the Federal old-age funds are matched dollar for dollar and in some States the rules and regulations are not so strict as they are in my State of Nebraska. So we can do nothing here, Mr. Chairman, regarding less strict rules and regulations no matter how we personally feel about it. We can, however, indicate that Congress feels that more leniency could be carried out in the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, this session seems to be one in which we are passing what I feel are deserved bouquets to the Members of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have taken home the three volumes of the hearings held on this bill, and on the other social-security proposals, and I hope to have the opportunity between the adjournment of this session and the convening of the next to thoroughly digest those three volumes. The committee has certainly put in long hours, and they have brought out a bill which I am sure most people will agree will improve the Social Security Act. I was particularly concerned about title 4, the provision relating to dependent children, and I think the committee has inserted a wise provision that will allow dollar-for-dollar matching with the States. After all is said and done, the youngsters today who are from 10 to 15 years of age have suffered a good deal during this period of depression. Many of them have not had an opportunity to live in what we call normal times, and many of their families have been receiving aid from cities and other agencies throughout their lifetime. It is poor economy to neglect the growing generations.

I think we are all in agreement with the change in the abolishment of the huge reserve fund, adopting a pay-asyou-go policy in connection with social security. That is not only wise, from an actuarial point of view, but it is sound. I used that in the campaign last fall, and I amused myself last evening by reading some clippings from the Connecticut newspapers at that time in which I was told that social security could not be set up on a pay-as-you-go basis. I am glad that we will have the opportunity to disprove that idea.

I have only one serious objection to the bill as reported out by the committee, and possibly the chairman can set my mind at ease on that point.

As I read the report of the committee, the testimony before the committee, and the bill itself, as I interpret it, I fear we are changing the terms of the social-security contract as it relates to single men. These people have been paying a pay-roll tax. They have been assured that in case they die before reaching the age of 65, their beneficiaries would receive a lump-sum payment-a predetermined amount. As I read the bill and the testimony and the report, that amount is being greatly reduced, to a comparatively small sum-six times the monthly payments, as I understand it. Possibly that is absolutely necessary, but if it is not I think it is something we should give serious consideration because such things have a tendency to break down the confidence of our people not only in social-security legislation but in our Government. Are they not liable to say, "Well, why should I be enthusiastic about this? Two years from now, 6 years from now, some other Congress will change their mind, and we will not get a cent out of it." In fact, I heard that in conversation just this morning.

As I say, if it is necessary, if it is a change that must be made, I suppose we must go along, but I hope that the committee can give us some additional information other than that in the report.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield at that point?

Mr. MILLER. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has raised one of the principal questions involved in the bill. Of course, as indicated by the gentleman's statement, we proceeded along this line under the present act. Now, in order to be able to provide for these additional benefits for the family group-that is, for the widows and children, those who are not provided for under existing law-it is necessary, of course, to have additional funds available for that. In the case of the single person, they still get all of their own benefits that they pay for. All that is done here is that we do appropriate a part of the employer's contribution to make it possible to provide these benefits for dependents, that is, widows and children. We should bear in mind that under the Social Security Act people are buying and paying for old-age insurance. It is not a banking arrangement, whereby they build up benefits for their present needs, but they are buying and paying for old-age insurance, benefits to which they would be entitled when they reach the age of 65, the retirement time.

Mr. MILLER. Let me ask this question right there: Suppose a single man remains single for a period of 15 years and then marries, will his old-age annuity be based on his full period of employment?

Mr. COOPER. Oh, yes; that is true. Then there is one other point, if I may.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Even in this bill that we have before us now the single person still gets vastly more in the way of oldage retirement insurance benefit than he could possibly buy from any insurance company with the same amount of money.

Mr. MILLER. I certainly appreciate that answer, because I think both sides of the aisle want to see social-security legislation perfected, but we do want to know what is in the bill and what the answer to these changes is and what information we can take back to those in our districts who are interested. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. MILLER. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. The last remark the gentleman has made is very illuminating. That is exactly the job, as I see it, of the members of the Ways and Means Committee at the present time, particularly in reading the bill under the 5-minute rule; that is, to endeavor to explain to Members who want to know exactly what the bill contains, although we have elaborated upon it as much as possible in both the majority and minority reports.

Mr. MILLER. I appreciate the information received.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Gearhart].

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill which is now before us for consideration, because I am convinced it will greatly improve the social-security system of our country.

Because there are so many here who have already spoken upon the advantages that will accrue from the adoption of this bill, I feel that I can well refrain from discussing any of the salutory phases of the measure. It is in respect to the imperfections in the bill I desire to address my remarks.

There are plenty to sing its praises.

The bill is far from perfection and it is because of those imperfections that I think there should be some plain speaking upon the floor of the Congress at this time. In my discussion I sincerely hope I do not fall into the practice of using the kind of words that were bandied about so liberally last week when another bill dealing with social security was under consideration, or using words, short and ugly ones; but, indeed, I might do that if I chose, because title II of the Social Security Act is an abomination, a monstrosity, one that should be eliminated from the whole scheme of social security.

In the first place, although it is named "insurance," it is not insurance. In the second place, it draws a line of demarcation between American people—those who shall have benefits and those who shall be denied benefits. It is therefore inequitable, unjust, unfair, and un-American. It provides that only those who are fortunate enough as to have jobs shall have security. Those who are not so fortunate as to have jobs are denied security. Now, I ask you, my colleagues, who is the more in need of security, those who go through life having jobs or those, the more unfortunate, who, though desiring work, can find nothing to do.

So I say it is fundamentally wrong when it endeavors to deal out security only to the more fortunate ones—the ones who are able to obtain employment.

That brings me to a consideration of those that are to have security under the terms of this legislation. Only those who have jobs are to be favored, because only those that have jobs are able to pay pay-roll taxes. Mind you, this is a tax levied upon the poorest, the humblest, and the least able to pay of all of the groups that compose our social structure; and still, by compulsion of law, even though those wages may be pitifully low, the strong arm of government descends upon them, and from them is taken by force a percentage of that which they earn, taken from them by force under the pretense that this money taken from them is going to be thereafter applied as something in the nature of a premium on an insurance policy, an insurance protection they will never get.

Yes, in pious tones they tell them as they forcibly extract these so-called pay-roll taxes from their slim wage envelopes that the money thus accumulated is going to be applied as something in the nature of an insurance-policy premium and that the fund thus developed will be invested for the benefit of the working people, to the end that they in their old age will be able to draw upon the earnings of that fund for the security which they must have when the time comes when they can no longer, because of advancing age, provide for themselves. I tell you that this pretense is very little less than a fraud, a fraudulent representation made to the American people, because not a nickel of the pay-roll tax money ever goes to any fund actually; on the contrary, it goes right into the General Treasury, from which it is paid out immediately in satisfaction of the ordinary demands upon the Government, the from day-to-day running expenses of the Government.

Yes, the act talks about a security fund; yes, the act talks about investing those funds in special-issue securities of the United States carrying an interest rate that used to be 3 percent; but all that, as the gentleman from New York so aptly described it during the course of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, is just a little bit of slippery bookkeeping. Actually every nickel of that pay-roll tax money is taken and immediately spent, not on social security, but in meeting the general operating expenses of the Government; and they tell the workingman, who is forced by compulsion of law to yield up that money, that he is buying security in the nature of insurance. That is a fraud on him, and if it were done by the executives of a private insurance company they would be immediately arrested and charged with embezzlement. It is a misappropriation of funds, nothing less.

But I do not want to leave the impression of criminality. There is nothing criminal about it, because the Social Security Act says that they can do just that very thing. It is therefore a legalized embezzlement, a legalized misappropriation, a legalized misrepresentation of the facts to the workingmen of this country.

How about pay-roll taxes as a system of taxation? Numerous famous economists appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and testified about pay-roll taxes per se. Dr. Albert G. Hart, of the University of Chicago, had this to say—and I quote:

I would not have any use for a pay-roll tax as a part of a general revenue system except insofar as it is hitched to social security.

Here is something else he said about pay-roll taxes:

If you have to raise the volume of your general revenues by a tax, I would say that the worst tax was the pay-roll tax.

The truthfulness of that cannot be questioned.

The pay-roll tax is positively the worst form of taxation that any legislative body has ever been able to devise. This, for the simple reason that it levies upon the poorest, the least able to pay, the humblest, a tax which they, least of all, can ill afford to pay.

Pay-roll taxes cannot be defended on the slim ground mentioned by Dr. Hart, because actually they are not "hitched" to social security at all.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. GEARHART. I yield.

Mr. BOEHNE. The gentleman from California has been denouncing title II of the Social Security Act. I wonder if he would tell us what he would substitute in its place.

Mr. GEARHART. I would repeal title II right now and begin building up title I into a fair and just system—as generous a system as our country can afford.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, my purpose is to speak briefly in reply to the remarks made by the preceding gentleman, not to discuss the other features of the bill which I will probably discuss later in the debate.

The gentleman from California has made some rather extreme statements. The gentleman from California certainly leaves the impression of being one who believes in being sensational. It is remarks like that, of course, that hit the headlines, it is the extravagant statement that hits the headlines. The good men and women who go along through life in the usual and orderly routine of life receive little attention, because that is not news. It is the criminal who is featured in the headlines, and it is the man in public life who makes wild and sensational statements not supported by the facts who hits the headlines.

The gentleman from California, of course, was paired for the Townsend plan.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. GEARHART. I just wondered how I was going to make the headlines today with the King and Queen of England in the city.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the gentleman's funeral. He certainly tried to hit the headlines. Whether he does or not makes no difference; it is the effort that counts.

The gentleman from California has only reiterated to the membership of the House some similar extreme statements he made during the committee hearings. On that occasion he said it was embezzlement, and ever since that time he has been apologizing, trying to get out from under because he said it was embezzlement. Now he says it is legalized embezzlement. The gentleman from California was paired for the Townsend plan. I assume had he been here he would have voted for it.

Of course, I can understand the gentleman's predicament. He is trying to justify that vote.

Let us analyze briefly what he wants to do. He advocates striking out title II. Well, if we strike that out we strike out all payments from 1940 to 1942. If we strike that out, it means nobody under the contributory annuity provisions will get an annuity until 1942; then the average annuity payment will be about $17.50 per person per month throughout the country, while noncontributory pensions throughout the country are now averaging over $19 per month.

The gentleman from California talks about distinguishing between groups of American citizens. Why, what greater distinction or what greater disparagement could he get than to put into operation a plan where men and women would pay their pay-roll taxes and when they arrived at the age when they would be entitled to annuity receive on an average only $17.50 a month and then have persons receive out of public funds—some group of aged persons, noncontributory annuitants—over $19 per month on an average throughout the United States?

Mr. Chairman, this bill aims to meet just that situation. The New York Times, which is a very fair newspaper, although somewhat critical of the present administration, and generally constructively so, this morning came out whole-heartedly for this particular title of the bill. The editorial of the New York Times is critical in respect to some other features of the bill but it absolutely comes out in favor of this particular provision, section, or title of the bill. I may say, incidentally, the Ways and Means Committee was practically unanimous in reporting out the title of the bill that my friend attacks.

The gentleman talks about the special fund. Of course, I can appreciate his position. It is politics. All right, but there is some limit to politics so far as some statements are concerned. What are the facts? May I state them just as simply as I can, without regard to how one might vote, but simply in an appeal to reason? Here is the situation: The pay-roll tax at the present time imposed on the contributory annuity provisions of the law is 1 percent on the employer and 1 percent on the employee. When collected, it goes into the Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, this money is put into the Treasury. It cannot be paid into a special fund directly because of a constitutional question. You all know the story about that. We had to separate the taxing provisions from the provisions relating to the payment of annuities, eligibility, and so forth. This money, as I stated, is paid into the Treasury. We appropriate that money each year into a special fund. What are you going to do—let that money lie idle? Yet, if you follow the reasoning of the gentleman from California, we would collect the pay-roll tax, bring it into the General Treasury, and the Congress would appropriate it to the Social Security Board or the trustees as set forth in the pending bill. The money would lie idle. Is that common sense?

What do we do? We want to put that money into some kind of safe investment. Certainly you and I would not want the pay-roll tax to be invested in the stocks and bonds of private companies. Therefore we say it should be invested in the securities of the Federal Government. Up to the time this bill was reported out of committee, Congress provided that such funds must earn 3-percent interest.

Of course, you cannot very well get Government bonds paying 3 percent now, particularly in large amounts. You might get a few, but not many. We therefore provided, in order to assure 3-percent interest, that if the Treasury, or, later, the trustees, if the pending bill passes, could not buy bonds on the market at 3 percent, they must issue special obligations bearing 3 percent. Congress said there had to be 3-percent interest. If we cannot get bonds, then we had to provide for the issuance of special obligations. We did the same thing in this case as was done in the case of the retirement fund for Federal employees, except in that case 4 percent was provided. That was recommended by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, and it was a sound recommendation.

What do we do by this bill? We say that instead of paying 3-percent interest, this special fund or those entrusted with its care shall obtain the average rate of interest, and we provide that they may buy bonds in the market if it is for the best interests of the Government.

Let us analyze that for a moment. Would any man in this House want the trustees of this fund to go out in the market and buy bonds if it would have an adverse effect on the market? Let us say the average rate of interest was 2.6 percent. That is about the average for long-term bonds today. It runs about 2.6 percent as an average. Suppose there were $50,000,000 in this fund and the trustees went out on the market to buy bonds paying the average rate of interest, but as a result of that transaction the market would go up sharply in price. Would it be for the best interests of the Government and other persons who are bondholders to have the Government use these funds in the open market, as a result of which the price of the bonds would be sharply increased? When that is done, and when payments become due, these bonds are sold. In the same way, when money is needed, the special obligations are discharged. The Government pays these special obligations.

The special obligations occupy the same position as a bond purchased in the market. When they need the money they simply call on the Government to pay these special obligations with interest. Suppose they had $30,000,000 worth of bonds and suppose they had to sell them to pay annuity benefits; suppose they dumped them on the market at one time and the price of the bonds would go down sharply as a result of that operation on the part of the Government? Do you think that should be done? I do not, and I do not believe the gentleman from California does either. There is the practical situation.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Wis-

Mr. KEEFE. I would like a little information on that point. The gentleman stated that when the trustees needed money with which to meet their obligations or pay annuities, they called upon the Government to pay and the Government pays. When they make the demand on the Government to pay those obligations, I would like to know where the Government ultimately is going to get the money to pay those obligations except by the levy of taxes? If they do have to resort to the levying of taxes, then are not these same contributors, who have contributed to the creation of this fund, going to be taxed again in order to ultimately receive their annuities? That is the question that agitates the people all over the country and I would like to have it earnestly answered.

Mr. McCORMACK. The special obligations are provided for in order to obtain the interest guaranteed, to prevent the Government bond market from fluctuating unreasonably against the interest, the Government, and the people.

When Congress provided that this fund shall earn 3-percent interest, guaranteed by the Government, and if bonds bearing that rate are not obtainable, it necessarily follows, unless the money is to be wholly idle, that some such provision had to be considered and enacted. In addition, it is a curb on governmental activities in its own bond market that would prevent Government bonds from fluctuating in the market in an adverse manner. Of course, when resorted to, indirectly, giving an answer to the gentleman of my own personal views, this constitutes an increase in the bonded indebtedness, but it is a situation provided by law, a situation that cannot be controlled if we are going to guarantee to this fund a stated rate of interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. It does constitute an increase to the extent that we resort to special obligations of the bonded indebtedness of the Government. Does that answer the gentleman's inquiry?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Just to analyze the point of view of the gentleman, which I realize is a point of view that is entertained by many, what is the practical difference between levying the taxes now to provide funds for the Government, with these people having to pay their proportional part, and later levying taxes to provide funds when these people would then just pay their proportional part? Certainly there cannot be any pactical difference.

Mr. KEEFE. If these trustees were empowered as any other similar trustees would be empowered to invest, for instance, in the obligations of the H. O. L. C., obligations which are fully guaranteed by the Government but will be paid out of funds paid to the H. O. L. C. by the citizens of America, then the taxes would not have again to be levied upon those people who contributed to create this fund. That is the point I am trying to bring out.

Mr. McCORMACK. In answer to the gentleman, I have frankly stated my opinion. Congress provides a certain rate of interest. In order to meet that rate of interest under certain circumstances special obligations would be issued. Precedent has been established for this. These obligations occupy the same status as a bond. They are in the same category as a bond.

Mr. KEEFE. I understand that.

Mr. McCORMACK. The characterization of these obligations as I O U's, of course, has no greater strength than if the same characterization were directed against a bond issued by the Government. Insofar as this committee is humanly able, we have provided in the pending bill a separate fund and provided for its administration by trustees, and insofar as we are humanly able we have directed those trustees to go into the open market when it is not inconsistent with the best interest of our Government and purchase bonds. In doing this, I submit to the gentleman from Wisconsin and my colleagues on both sides of the aisles, we are doing everything we can possibly do. My purpose in rising was to briefly answer what I believe to be the unwarranted statements, inconsistent with the facts of the gentleman from California.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART].

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, even at the risk of being accused again of cheap politics, I rise to make a little more plain, I hope, just what a legalistic fiction all this is. The gentleman from Massachusetts has carefully explained to you the elaborate method they have of handling these so-called pay-roll taxes. They levy a pay-roll tax and they get the money, and then the slippery bookkeeping begins. They make out I O U's, they appropriate the money from one fund to another, and they say it is invested when it is gone. And where is it? As soon as the Government got this payroll tax from the poorest people in this country—those least able to pay it—they immediately spent the money building battleships, paying benefits to people, and spending it on P. W. A. and W. P. A. and upon every other routine activity of the Government. But not a bit of it on social security. When spent, the money is gone, and it is gone forever as soon as it is spent, because there is no necessity for the Government ever to pay it back for the simple reason that the interest on those I O U's furnishes the money which must be raised to care for the maturing demands against the social-security system set up in title II. Since none of the moneys collected as pay-roll taxes will be needed to pay the workers under title II, where will the Government get the money to pay the old-age pensions?

It will get it just the way it gets all the other money it must have, it will borrow it or levy an additional tax. It will levy a tax on the people, all the people, not a part of the people. It will levy a tax on all the people to get the money, the money that is needed to pay the claim against the socialsecurity fund. And when they levy that tax on all the people they catch again the man who has already paid the pay-roll tax. In other words, this ridiculous, unfair, and unjust system is a double system of taxation upon the poorest, and the humblest, the man least able to pay. They divert this money into wrong channels, they misappropriate it, they indulge in legalized embezzlements, and then after they have spent the money on something entirely disasso-ciated with social security they double back and make him pay it again.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GEARHART. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Of course, the situation would be dissimilar if the Government were running on a balanced Budget basis

Mr. GEARHART. That is correct. If we were not indulging in deficit finance, this whole system of monkey business would crash to the ground. When, oh, when, will the people but understand? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL.]

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with my own discourse I am constrained to make some sort of response to my genial friend from California who found it necessary to make the second explanation of what he intended in the first place to convey to this House. The fact of the matter is-and I hope I may have the attention of my friend from California-the arguments which he put forth on this floor have been exploded so completely and on so many occasions that no one pays any particular attention to such statements. He seems to be the only one left who still persists in baseless quotations.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. DINGELL. In just a moment I will yield.

Mr. GEARHART. I seem to have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Massa-

Mr. DINGELL. It seems to me like a sort of reecho of what some short-eared jackass said somewhere, sometime, for political reasons, and my friend drags this back on the floor as though it were something new and important.

It has been exploded, shattered by experts, and it is as dead as the dodo. When Californians talk about battleships, and their elimination as a possible argument against the bill or any of its provisions, I do not think that is very good politics, and I dare say he will probably strike that reference out of his own remarks in the RECORD, because California is constantly shouting for battleships and more battleships, and I am wondering if the gentleman disagrees with the great bulk of his fellow Californians?

Mr. McLEAN. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Peterson of Georgia). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand the rule requires that the gentleman shall address himself to the bill.

Mr. DINGELL. I am addressing myself to remarks made in connection with the point raised by the gentleman, and I am not taking any orders from you.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is out of order and I insist that the gentleman shall proceed in order.

Mr. DINGELL. Well, we will make it in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just one additional reference to the remarks of my friend and that is that all of the evidence before the committee bearing upon the subject of soundness of investing social-security funds, and particularly on that point by all the experts and by all of the witnesses representing industrialists, labor groups, bankers, and even some representatives of the Hearst papers. were all agreed that this method of financing is sound, and I do not think there can be any question at all about it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. DINGELL. I shall be glad to yield. Mr. COOPER. I am sure the gentleman will recall that the Advisory Council, which embraced some of the outstanding men of the Nation-Swope, of General Electric, and men of that type, as well as outstanding representatives of the labor organizations of the country-unanimously agreed that the handling of this fund was absolutely proper, and they were a unit in their recommendation on that point.

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman from Tennessee has just referred to a statement that Mr. Swope made. May I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that he testified before our Ways and Means Committee as follows:

Much discussion has been occasioned by the estimate of the enormous reserve which will be accumulated in 1980. I have never taken this seriously * * * *. Nor have I any fears that these funds in the hands of the Government are in any sense insecure.

Then the question was asked him:

"You do not consider that the investment of the money in special obligations is embezzlement, legalistic or otherwise?" And Mr. Swope answered, "Certainly not; it is a shame to so designate it."

Mr. DINGELL. I thank the gentleman for his contribu-

Mr. Chairman, after several months of arduous work, the Committee on Ways and Means presents to the Congress a bill containing many and important amendments to the social-security law. These changes were decided upon only after listening to suggestions made by representatives of business, labor, and farmers. In fact, all elements concerned were given an opportunity to give testimony in open hearings which continued for a period of at least 2 months. The exhaustive hearings covered every phase of existing law. Advocates of every conceivable kind of plan argued the merits of their respective proposals. Experts were presented before the committee by proponents of various plans in order to sustain their contentions of soundness and workability. When the calendar of available witnesses was exhausted the committee went into executive sessions, which terminated with the reporting of H. R. 6635, the bill now before you. The committee labored continuously and diligently for over 4

Every paragraph, I dare say, of existing law and every suggestion made by witnesses was carefully analyzed as to the possible maximum benefit to the people.

Workability and the costs had to be studied with utmost care. Expert advice was available and consulted at every step in the advancement toward the completed measure. This bill, Mr. Chairman, should meet every demand of the liberals and progressives in Congress. The conservatives need not fear lack of soundness or workability.

I presume there are Members here today who will not be satisfied with the extensions and generous amendments, but I do not find fault with them because I myself was obliged to compromise some of my own views in order to reach an agreement. I am satisfied, however, that the bill gives very substantial satisfaction to those who rightfully demanded broadening and liberalization. It is gratifying to note that in spite of the increased benefits it was possible to allow substantial reductions in taxes covering old-age and unemployment-compensation insurance.

It seems almost paradoxical that in spite of substantial tax cuts that the law could be extended, expanded, and liberalized, yet that is an absolute fact. The biggest problem as I view it, which confronted the committee at all times, was the problem of working out a broad general plan covering more beneficiaries in every walk of life and under varied circumstances and issuing, so to speak, only one kind of policy under one identical premium for upward of 40,-000,000 people. Imagine the elasticity necessary to apply to such a task and the cramped situation which checked the committee's progress on all sides. The one-policy, one-premium-for-all problem, was ever present. Contrast this with the latitude of an insurance company which can and does write any kind of policy to fit the purse, desire, and amount of benefit demanded by the insured.

After all, the committee membership is not composed of insurance experts or actuaries. Yet in spite of our handicaps and limitations, I am prone to believe in the fundamental soundness of our proposal. In considering the bill, keep before you at all times the fact that the benefits are intended for the living, for the insured, upon attainment of the statutory age of 65. It is not intended to create an estate. The old-age annuity provisions were not only increased for the benefit of the insured but were extended to include aged wives, widows, children, and aged dependent parents. The freezing of the employer and employee tax for the years of 1940, 1941, and 1942 at 1 percent instead of 11/2 percent as provided by present law will save the taxpayers about $275,000,000 per annum for the 3 years, or a total of $825,000,000 for the 3 years.

Benefit disbursements of $1,775,000,000 will be made during 1940-44. While under existing law the beneficiaries would receive about one-third of this amount or $555,000,000. The benefit increment for the 5 years amounts to approximately $1,200,000,000. Experts advised the committee that the total costs over the next 45 years will be about the same as under present law. The cost in the early years will be greater due to greater benefits being paid to annuitants not necessarily entitled to higher benefits if their proportionate premiums are calculated. This policy is quite generally in effect in all benefit plans and is firmly established as sound and fair. At all times, however, the insured receive in benefits far more than they would from an insurance company. I call to your attention and commend for your study table No. 1 on page 8 of the report giving comparisons of total benefit payments under the existing and the proposed

Bear in mind at all times that the date of benefit payments is to be advanced from 1942 to 1940. For the purpose of the record I will include the table, though I will forego reading the figures.

A more detailed table of increased benefits covering the individual annuitant equally graphic and forceful will be found on page 10. I will not read the figures in detail but will cite only a few.

Take an insured man earning an average monthly wage of $100. Under existing law, which requires 5 years of premium payments, the insured would not be eligible for benefits for another 2 years. Under the revised plan he will receive, beginning with 1940, $25.75 per month for life, if single; if married, he will receive $38.63 per month. Follow that a step further, and you will observe in the next line that the insured at the end of 5 years under the present plan would be paid at the rate of $17.50 per month, while under the revised plan if single he would receive $26.25 or $39.38 per month if married. These payments, of course, are for life.

¹ It is assumed, with respect to the revised plan, that an individual earns at least $200 in each year of coverage in order to be eligible to receive the 1-percent increment. If this were not the case, the benefit would be somewhat lower.

² Benefits for a married couple without children where wife is eligible for a supplement.

Benefits not paid until after 5 years of coverage.

What to me is an attractive illustration of benefits purchased under the liberalized plan will be found on page 14. This table No. 5 shows exactly what an employee could purchase for himself in the form of an annuity policy with only his own tax contribution as a premium, as compared to what he will receive under the social-security plan, as revised.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman stated the amount that he can buy with his 3 percent or 1 percent—eventually 3 percent. Would it not be fair to also figure in the employers?

Mr. DINGELL. I am coming to that, and I want to assure my friend that I am trying to be fair to the insurance companies and to the plan proposed.

Take, for your example, a level monthly wage of $100 and an employee paying to a private insurance company the amount of his own contribution without the contribution of his employer; at the end of 3 years he would receive under the suggested plan before you $25.75 per month for life, while under a purchasable annuity he would receive nothing; at the end of 5 years he will receive under the suggested plan $26.25 per month for life, while under a purchasable annuity he would still receive nothing.

After paying for 10 years he would receive $27.50 per month for life under the suggested plan, while under a purchasable annuity he would receive only 41 cents per month. In only one instance does the table show in favor of purchasable annuities, and that is on the basis of a level monthly wage of $250, where payments have been made for 45 years, and then the advantage amounts to only 30 cents per month.

In all fairness, however, I am constrained to point out that if an annuitant purchased a policy from an insurance company with the same aid in contribution from his employer as is being paid under the social-security plan the figures paid in benefits would be greater. At all times under the new plan the annuitant receives far more in benefits than he pays for.

¹ These calculations are based upon the standard annuity table, at 3 percent interest. Taxes less 10-percent allowance for expenses are used for theoretic premiums. Part of the taxes are applied to the purchase of a death benfit which is identical with that of the suggested plan, and the remainder of the taxes are applied to the purchase of a deferred annuity with no death benefit.

The following assumptions have been made:

As regards taxes: A 1-percent tax rate on employer and also on employee through 1942; a 2-percent tax rate on each in 1943-45; a 2½-percent tax rate on each in 1946-48; and a 3-percent tax rate on each in 1949 and thereafter.

As regards benefits: Continuous years of coverage from age at entry to age 65, retirement at age 65, individual remains single for his entire lifetime and does not leave a widow, a child under 18, or a dependent parent.

¹ Taxes are used up entirely in purchasing the lump-sum death benefit so that no annuity is purchasable.

As regards unemployment insurance taxes and benefits, I must of necessity be as brief as possible. I do want to say, however, that the benefits here, too, have been increased, while the tax has been very materially reduced, or, at least, made possible where the reserves meet the Federal requirements. These are to the effect that the State cash reserve must equal either the maximum total of benefit payments to the unemployed or the total taxes collectible in any one year within a specified period in 10 years, whichever is greater.

It is estimated that the savings in taxes for 1940 to employers where States avail themselves of the change in the basic law will amount to $200,000,000 to $250,000,000, depending, of course, on the number of States that will take advantage of the change.

I believe there are now 35 States which can take advantage of the reduction because of ample reserves on hand. Before the expiration of 1939 all but seven States will be able to take advantage of the new law. At least, so it appears at the present time.

Should the States wherein the reserves meet the new requirements act early enough to bring relief to their employers the savings to this class of taxpayers may reach an additional figure of $100,000,000 for 1939.

Some States and some Governors might not be very anxious to take advantage of these reductions, as is evidenced in Michigan. I have written Governor Dickinson and the Acting Lieutenant Governor, and also to the speaker of the house, urging immediate legislative action to enable my State taking advantage of the proposed prospective tax reductions. I even submitted a brief as a guide. But unfortunately the legislature could not or would not delay adjournment and the Governor did not exercise any persuasion to effect the consideration of the brief. A special session will very likely be forced by the taxpayers in order to comply with the Federal statute. I am hopeful this delay will do no harm.

Penalties imposed upon employers for delayed payments of the tax due in 1936-37 and 1938 which will be remitted amount to $15,000,000.

The law has been liberalized to permit the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to grant 90 days' extension of time for payment of taxes without penalty instead of 60 days, as provided under present law.

Payment for a taxable year paid after January 31 and not later than July 1 next following close of taxable year will be penalized 10 percent of the allowable credit instead of 90 percent, as at present.

Upon the passage of the bill before you an additional savings of $65,000,000 will be made possible because taxes will be applicable to the first $3,000 of taxable salary. This same limitation already exists in the present annuity tax. The changes in existing law as proposed by the bill are too extensive for me to even attempt to cover in detail. Therefore let me say to you that I recommend a careful study by each and every Member of the first 32 pages of the report.

This bill needs no defense at my hands and you will not find it difficult to uphold. I am proud of my contribution toward its liberalization for I was privileged to build the structure of the draft before you.

And now as to the old-age pensions, these have always been my first and greatest concern. I have tried for ever so many years to bring about the adoption of a workable national plan of substantial pension payments to the deserving old people. I have been amply rewarded for my patience by the fact that I was privileged to help draft the law, and then later to witness the signing by President Roosevelt at the White House of this instrumentality, which established on a permanent basis the payment of old-age pensions. While I have advocated the increase of the Federal contribution as far back as 1935, and insisted upon $20 instead of $15, it was only a few days ago that the committee, realizing the fairness and substance of the amendment, adopted the higher rate, which when matched by the States will make possible a maximum pension of $40 a month per eligible pensioner. I hold that a Federal-State pension system is generous and ample when it permits the payment of a maximum of $80 per month to an aged couple. Your Uncle Samuel will pay his half if the States will do likewise.

I am confident that the people of this country will assume that such an amount in extreme cases will be sufficient to provide comfort and contentment to the old folks.

Dependent children and widows, as originally provided for in my bill, will be taken care of by the McCormack amendment, which I supported and which was forced through after three defeats. This amendment provides for Federal matching on a 50-50 basis instead of as heretofore, the one-third to two-thirds paid by the States. In various detailed ways the provisions of existing law were liberalized. The cost increase of the ratio in matching will cost the Federal Government thirty to fifty million dollars per annum. It is my hope, and of the committee, that the States will supplement this amount to reach more of the deserving dependent children. Widows and orphaned dependent children should be our first concern.

To hurry on toward the termination of my discourse, let me say that vocational rehabilitation, too, has been worked over and generous amendments added to existing law. A million dollars has been added to the authorization.

Before adopting any of the amendments contained in the bill the committee had to at all times calculate the element of costs and the ability of the taxpayer to meet them with prompt regularity.

It is, as you know, the function and the responsibility of this committee to provide the revenues covering all authorized appropriations. Mindful of the obligations which the committee owes to the aged, the crippled, blind handicapped, and to the dependent children, we were constrained nevertheless to take into account the obligation which we owe, first, to the taxpayer. Every monthly increase in benefits, matters not how small, grows to tremendous proportions, because it must be multiplied 12 times for each year and then again hundreds of thousands, or even millions, of times, depending on the number of beneficiaries to be covered. Because of the permanency of these benefits, if the gross total cost of any proposal is desired, we must multiply the gross annual costs by the normal life expectancy or statutory eligibility of the intended recipients. Altogether these added benefits mount to staggering figures.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, knowing the gentleman's interest in old-age pensions, and understanding the part he has taken in sponsoring the increase in this bill, I ask him if he thinks the committee has gone as far as practicable in the various provisions of the pending bill, and whether the bill should be supported in the House as is?

Mr. DINGELL. I am absolutely positive on that point, that there should be no changes at the present time—that the membership should be patient in order that we may observe the workings of these new amendments and test the sincerity and willingness of the States to go along and meet the requirements and concessions thus far made in this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the bill as presented, or as amended if the amendments are constructive and practical, not demagogic, and I will urge you, my colleagues, to do likewise. Then as time goes on and through experience we learn that further liberalization is needed and possible, that the Treasury can stand the strain of minor additional benefits, I will be the first among you to fight to bring this about.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. Yes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I made this interruption for the purpose of inquiring, because I have received so many letters in respect to it from smaller chambers of commerce, whether they are exempted under the provisions of this act.

Mr. COOPER. We have taken care of the small chambers of commerce.

Mr. DINGELL. Yes. That was very definitely analyzed and provided for.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Carlson].

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, before I enter into a discussion of the pending bill, I want to express my personal thanks to the chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] and to the other members of the Ways and Means Committee. During the several months of hearings and executive sessions on the pending legislation, the membership of the committee were very generous and kind. As a new member of that committee, it was necessary for me to ask many questions, to get information that the older members no doubt felt was a waste of time. Your understanding and kindness were appreciated.

The committee has presented for your consideration H. R. 6635. As has been previously stated, these amendments to the present social-security law are the results of months of work. There were many and varied views in regard to the amendments proposed, and to the social-security program as a whole. It is my intention to discuss frankly and honestly what I believe to be some of the errors in the principles of the present act as well as its inadequacy in caring for the present and future social problems.

My remarks will be confined to those sections of the bill dealing with old-age retirement and unemployment insurance.

On several occasions the statement has been made that our Nation has embarked on a more ambitious and far-reaching social-security program than any nation on the face of the earth. This ambitious program has been in existence less than 4 years and already has 42,000,000 registrants under title II or old-age insurance. Its contacts, present and future, may have a vital effect on our national economy and even go so far as to have a direct or indirect effect on government itself.

In other words, we have developed a social-security program with a mushroomlike growth, when, for permanency's sake, it might have been better to develop it as a sturdy oak. Proposed changes are already knocking at the door. This bill makes a very radical change in titles II and VIII, relating to old-age insurance. Any social-security or old-age pension plan that we may adopt is an additional tax burden and in this respect the present bill requires the collecting of new and additional taxes.

The existing law was enacted in 1935. The public paid little attention to titles II and VIII because they did not take effect for nearly 2 years, or until January 1, 1937. The act was passed by Congress with very little attention being paid to its ultimate cost, at a time when any bill sent it by the administration was considered "must" legislation. Two years of tax collections under its provisions, amounting to more than five hundred millions annually, are bringing to the attention of the country the additional burden of taxation on labor, agriculture, and industry. In my opinion, there will be an increasing general reaction to this tax burden.

There is no doubt that the act's generosity is confined largely to the older workers, with its greater tax hardships generally allocated to the younger and future registrants and their employers. There is a growing fear that the portion of the present pay-roll tax paid by the employers is and will continue to be shifted to the consuming public through higher prices. The 42,000,000 registrants make up a large part of the adult public. This point has been raised by friends of the act.

Mr. Thomas Eliot, formerly general counsel of the Social Security Board, writing in the Atlantic Monthly, August 1938, said:

Society will bear a large part of the burden on employers. The matter of whether the act will be a boon to the young workers will turn on that question and on several other similar questions which deal with the risks of the young. If we assume that the employers' half is shiftable to the public, including the registrants, then old-age provisions may become very much less of a boon to the younger workers.

We must bear in mind at all times that a pay-roll tax taxes employment. It seems doubtful to me that any tax can be persuaded to encourage the very thing it taxes. The risk of young workers is that this tax, by discouraging employment, may create more old-age dependency than the benefits can cure. The tax may be expected to bear hardest on man-power industries and to encourage mechanization.

The present combined pay-roll tax is only 2 percent. But some actuaries have estimated that in future years the program may require support equal to taxes of 10 percent to 12 percent of the pay rolls, or more. This means that the present plan involves another form of "leaning on the future" quite as we do when the Government operates on a deficit and borrows money to pay its bills. The world's history of the past 25 years contains a number of illustrations of "leaning on the future." There is among them not a single record of success.

So far, there have been no signs of serious rebellion against pay-roll taxes, but it is interesting to note that the Amercan Federation of Labor in its Denver convention, 1937, proposed assistance to the plan by Federal contributions. A 1938 bulletin from the social security committee of C. I. O. proposed that the full cost of old-age benefits be put directly on the Treasury. The Social Security Board and the Advisory Council on Social Security have both recommended that a portion of the cost of the program be taken from general taxation. The Advisory Council was very specific and stated that one-third of the cost should be borne by general

Should this be done, it destroys the principle of a selfsupporting, pay-as-you-go pension plan. It is most unfair to the citizens of our country who were too old to qualify for benefits under the plan, and to agriculture, certain professional classes, and the self-employed. They will be paying for a pension plan without receiving benefits.

The Social Security Act was passed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 371 to 33. This indicates that the bill had the support of agriculture. But the bill was for a selfsupporting system of, by, and for the industrial workersthat agriculture was not much concerned at the moment. If, however, it is found that the act is not self-supporting because of miscalculations, or if the proposal to abandon selfsupport is pressed, it seems only reasonable to expect that agriculture will complain, in the first place, and oppose in the second.

Taxation as general taxpayers, without benefits, presumably would not appeal to the farming area. It would appear that organized labor's complaints about the pay-roll taxes and the clamor for a reduction of taxes paid by the employers may have put agriculture on notice that the system is not exclusively one of benefits, but involves paying for them also.

Some will simply state that agriculture should come under the program, and thus there could be no general complaint. It seems to me that agriculture would be very unwise to enter the plan in its present state. The fundamental principles of the plan, namely, the principle of self-support and the reserve basis, have been thrown back into the arena of debate.

Agriculture seems entitled to know exactly what it is invited to join and to have proof of the system's solvency. It seems entitled also to know exactly what its general taxpaying responsibility will become in connection with the present plan if it should remain outside.

It is my contention that the farmers of this Nation are now paying a large part of the cost of the national social security program. This is of vital concern to approximately six and one-half million farm families representing 30,000,000 of our

On this subject I want to call your attention to the testimony of Dr. John Lee Coulter, as it appears in the hearings, beginning on page 980. Dr. Coulter has spent more than 30 years in the field of agricultural economics, and during these years has owned and managed his own farms. He stated:

Unless agriculture is able to secure for the products of the soil prices which are reasonably in harmony with other prices, farmers in turn are unable to purchase from the market and their position is disadvantageous.

The reason for that, fundamentally, is that farmers sell their labor in the form of prices received for goods rather than in the form of wages or salaries. The great majority of other groups receive their compensation in the form of wages or salaries.

The farmers of the country produce, let us say, $10,000,000,000 worth on the farm. These commodities, when they move to the city and through the processing establishments and when they reach the consumer, represent a so-called value of farm products that has doubled or trebled or quadrupled.

Mr. Knurson. Dr. Coulter, the arguments which you have raised against the transactions tax apply with equal force to the pay-roll against the transactions tax apply with equal force to the pay-roll tax insofar as its effect on the farmer?

Dr. Coulter. Yes. If they become pyramided, a series of one after another added to a commodity, and if imposed suddenly, they become equally burdensome, and I think at the present time the various pay-roll taxes imposed under the social-security program, if added to the cost of products, and the final price of them, is one of the factors, maybe the largest factor in bringing about and continuing the disparity between farm prices and the prices which farmers have to pay. That disparity is present. I don't think anyone can blink at that. And no method has yet been found to bring the farm prices up. Temporarily, by loans without recourse, we bring them up, but destroy our market in so doing, destroy our foreign market, pile up surpluses, and the farmer has less to sell. Undoubtedly the new costs added to the finished products have become a big factor in putting stuff out of the reach of the farm population. population.

Mr. Carlson. I want to assure you, doctor, that I very greatly appreciate your statement, because I am personally acquainted with your familiarity with the agricultural sections of the Middle West. your familiarity with the agricultural sections of the Middle West. You have stated the effect this legislation (H. R. 2 and H. R. 11) would have on agriculture if enacted into law. You have also stated the effect the proposed amendment to the Social Security Act would have on agriculture if enacted. Now, I wonder if you can give the committee any information as to what the present social-security law is costing agriculture.

Dr. Coulter. I haven't tried to make an estimate. I haven't tried to estimate the extent of the burden. I do feel, without any doubt at all, from all of the data on hand, that it is one of the factors producing the present disparity between prices which farmers pay for what they buy and the prices which they receive. I think it is one of the larger factors. Those increased costs are bound to be reflected in the price of things they buy.

Mr. Chairman, I want to direct your attention to the statement on page 2 of the committee report concerning a saving of $275,000,000 annually for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942 by freezing the present pay-roll taxes at 1 percent each on employer and employee. This statement says there will be a net saving of $825,000,000 in 3 years.

On the same page we find the statement that by beginning payments next year instead of in 1942, and by liberalizing payments, we will spend $1,200,000,000 more than was contemplated under the original act during the period of 1940 to 1944, inclusive,

In other words, in spite of reducing collections $825,000,000 we are increasing expenditures by $1,200,000,000. This is nothing short of magic. The present administration is determined to spend prospective revenues during the immediate future. This is not a sound business policy and will eventually destroy the protection for which these people have paid.

Let us analyze the so-called savings and increased benefits. One Government estimate indicates that by 1954 socialsecurity tax income will total $1,800,000,000, while demands for benefits will be more than $2,000,000,000. Thereafter demands will increase faster than revenues, unless taxes are increased. Thus, in 15 years, annual disbursements for oldage benefits will exceed annual income from pay-roll taxes. Therefore, at that time, Congress must either increase payroll levies or appropriate funds for social-security payments out of general revenue.

It is reasonable to assume that there will be great pressure against the scheduled increase of the tax to 4 percent in 1943, and to 5 percent in 1946, and there will undoubtedly be even greater resistance to the proposed increase to 6 percent in 1949 and thereafter.

It is reasonable to assume that there will be great pressure against the scheduled tax increases in 1943, and there will undoubtedly be a greater resistance to the increase of the rate to 6 percent in 1949. We cannot have tax reduction and increased benefits.

The principle of self-support in the present act means that the schedules of taxes and benefits were so established that the former are expected to support the latter. The present tax rate of 2 percent increases at 3-year intervals until it reaches 6 percent in 1949.

The Treasury has computed that a level top rate of 5.34 percent on pay rolls is the actuarial equivalent of the present 2 percent to 6 percent scale. In other words, any deferred payments at the present time means that this loss of revenue must be collected through increased taxes in the future. If the act is to be self-supporting, we must have the so-called level tax rate of 5.34 percent.

The Treasury has estimated $867 as the average annual Assuming 42,000,000 registrants, the total pay roll is $3,414,000,000 per annum; the accruing liability is 5.34 percent of that sum; and the present tax that is being collected is 2 percent of that sum, leaving a difference of 3.34 percent of that amount to represent the present annual amount by which the taxes are not satisfying the accruing liability.

Some contend that the actuarial cost of this program may be in excess of 12 percent. Dr. Altmeyer stated that the eventual cost when the system reached its maturity would be 9.35 percent. I do not believe that anyone can visualize the time when industry and labor will be willing to carry a tax burden of approximately 10 percent of the pay roll for social security. Dr. Altmeyer's testimony on this subject is very interesting.

Mr. ALTMEYER. If we go off the so-called Reserve method of financing, we are confronted inevitably with three alternatives in the future when the annual benefit costs will have increased steadily, as they will, of either increasing the contributions based upon pay roll above the present maximum of 3 percent, of making some contribution out of the general funds of the Treasury, or of reducing benefits. There can be no other alternatives except those three. I should like to put the position of the Board this way: We feel very strongly that Congress today ought to indicate what the general strongly that Congress today ought to indicate what the general strongly that Congress today ought to indicate what the general strongly that Congress today ought to indicate what the general strongly that Congress today ought to indicate what the general strongly that the general strongly that the general strongly that the general strongly that the strongly that t real policy of the Government will be when that point is reached in the future. If Congress believes the contribution rate should be increased from 3 percent to 3½ percent, or 7 percent altogether, instead of the present maximum of 6 percent, then that should be indicated at this time. If, on the other hand, Congress believes that 3 percent each, or 6 percent altogether, is a reasonable maximum of forest them. mum so far as it can determine at this time, then Congress ought to indicate at this time that it favors some contributions out of general revenues. But to increase benefits at this time or to postpone the increase in the contribution rate at this time without taking into account the eventual consequences of either or both actions seems to the Board to create a situation where the future financing of the system and the future benefits provided under the system are thrown into doubt.

Mr. ALTMEYER. Specifically, the actuaries estimated that the level premium cost—the average cost over the lifetime of the system—would be a little over 5 percent, and the eventual cost when the system reached its maturity would be 9.35 percent.

Mr. DISNEY. The cost?

Mr. ALTMEYER. The cost. It was estimated that the difference between the eventual maximum contribution of 3 percent each, or 6 percent together, and the 9.35-percent eventual cost, in 1980, would be met through the interest earnings on the reserve which would have accumulated by that time.

Mr. Disney. That would be direct taxes, of course.

Mr. Altmeyer. That interest would have to be raised through direct taxes. However, I think you have to distinguish between the interest earnings of a reserve and a direct Government con-the interest earnings of a reserve and a direct Government contribution to the system. While the interest earnings on the reserve are raised presumably through general taxation, the citizens who pay the taxes to cover the interest earnings have received a quid pro quo in the past, because they have had the use of the money that the contributors have paid into the Treasury under the old-age insurance system

Since 1935 the actuaries are rather agreed—in fact, I know of no disagreement among the actuaries as to the general proposition that the costs of the present title II have been underestimated. The range in increase in costs—and I emphasize range—is up to as much as 50 percent greater in 1980 than originally estimated.

The Advisory Council's final report makes this interesting comment:

It (the Council) is of the belief that we shall not commit future generations to a burden larger than we would want to bear ourselves.

They also said in their report:

Information now available indicated that the benefit structure under title II of the present act will involve financing from all sources of annual disbursements equivalent to 10 to 12 percent covered pay rolls by 1980, when persons now in their twenties will be at the retirement age. Certain members of the Council who are actuaries fear that the upper limit of the eventual cost of the benefits will be higher than here estimated.

Time will not permit a full discussion of the proposed changes of benefit payments due the covered workers under the old-age insurance plan or title II. But the American people should know that we are now changing rulings in the middle of the game. We are leaving the original principle of individual insurance and individual savings accounts-for a program of social insurance. The individual loses his identity and his savings becomes a part of a great national social-security pool. The individual worker becomes but a part of a great social machine. To me, it is but another step that leads to a social program similar to the type in existence in Russia and other totalitarian governments. Every wage earner who is single will be compelled to pay a tax and unless he or his dependents live until 65 years or older-his heirs or estate will receive the beneficient sum needed for burial expenses. This also carries a proviso which reads-"but no such payment for burial expenses may exceed the amount actually disbursed by the person or persons who paid such expenses." Should he, through an accident or otherwise, become totally disabled, he could not draw a dollar in insurance or benefits from the fund until he reached 65 years of age, and then his payments would be based on the wages paid during the years he was actually able to work.

This revision of schedules is in favor of the near old, at the expense of the young. Thousands of our citizens and workers who thought they were accumulating an insurance and savings account now find that these funds have been thrown together into a national pool without even consulting them.

The Ways and Means Committee has recommended a reduction in pay-roll taxes for old-age insurance. But no outright reduction is being recommended for the 3-percent unemployment-insurance tax. It is true that the section dealing with the unemployment-insurance tax is being rewritten on a merit-rating basis with new and additional State requirements. This 3-percent tax is a great burden on the employers and has a direct effect on our unemployment problem. Many of our small businesses and industries cannot afford this drain. Almost every city and good-sized town had examples of the destructive effect of this tax during the past year. Every time a small business or industry is forced to close its doors—the number of our unemployed increases. In a number of instances, the employers refuse to increase their pay rolls in excess of eight, in order to avoid the tax; and in other instances, it becomes necessary for employers to reduce their pay rolls to eight or less in order to avoid paying this tax. Therefore, this has a serious effect on the unemployed of our country. This is easy to understand, when one realizes that every time an employer puts a new worker on the pay roll at $100 per month, he adds a tax to his business of $48 per year. In my opinion, Congress might well reduce the pay-roll taxes from 3 percent to 2 percent instead of adopting the involved language of the provisions of this section.

The Social Security Board says that the tax rate should average 2.7 percent. Who can say at this time whether that is too much or not enough? We must have additional experience to show us what benefits for total and partial unemployment are to cost, as there is no way of predicting what the tax should be. The proposed amendment attempts to lay down standards which the States must meet; and it seems to me that it is entirely too early to try to establish these standards, as the States have not had enough experience to say what they should be. Everyone will agree that it is not logical or sensible to unduly tax the pay rolls and rob purchasing power of sorely needed funds, while building up large surpluses in unemployment compensation funds. In my opinion, the unemployment compensation tax should be lowered now, and if later experience shows that more funds are needed, the tax can be increased.

No one will deny reasonable benefits to the eligible unemployed. But, if advocates of more benefits are not careful, we will have a dole which places a premium on unemployment. Estimates of increased costs due to shortening of the waiting period and increasing duration, plus the addition of benefits for partial unemployment, vary from 20 to 50 percent. If these estimates are fair, then the formula in this section for a tax reduction is but an idle gesture, for the funds cannot raise the required one and one-half times. In good years it will be one and one-half times the increased total tax, and in bad years one and one-half times the increased total benefits-so it would catch the State coming or going.

Congress would perform a real service in the way of business appeasement and aid to employment by reducing the unemployment compensation tax from 3 to 2 percent now. With surpluses now in the State funds, no State will suffer before the time Congress again has an opportunity to study the picture. If this is not done, I sincerely believe this entire section, 1602, should be eliminated and the law rest as it is. This would give the States a chance to try out "experience rating" which is permissible, as the law now stands.

This new provision also threatens a very serious competitive problem between the various States. This section is so drawn that competing industries may pay a very high tax rate in one State and in the adjoining State would have no unemployment taxes to pay. This should cause everyone to give serious consideration to it before it is enacted into law. My personal opinion is that if this situation develops as it might—it will mean the future destruction of the act itself.

In conclusion, I wish to state that I believe we need and will have a social-security program in this country. This program must be based on a pay-as-you-go plan, be actuarily sound, and have in mind the present and future cost of the program. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, it is my intention this afternoon to discuss in advance some of the amendments that Members have suggested they would offer on the floor when the reading of the bill begins.

Prior to that I do want to say a few words with reference to the discussion that arose this afternoon on the subject of the soundness of the investment of the funds which have been collected for old-age insurance payments and those which will be collected and paid into the new trust fund. These funds are required by law, and will continue to be required, to be invested in United States Government obligations. It is amusing to me that anyone who has had any grasp of the finances of the United States, of States, or of municipalities should feel any concern over the fact that funds for retirement payments or trust funds of any kind should be invested in the very best obligations that exist, those of the Nation, the State, or the municipality itself. If the credit of our Nation is not worth anything at all, then the wails and moans of those who call these investments "the purchases of I O U's" might be justified; but if the credit of our Nation is not worth anything, then the retirement fund, the annuity fund itself, and your money in your own pockets is not worth anything. I do not know of a single person with authority in finance or economics who would appear before this august body and testify otherwise than that the present system of investing these trust funds in the obligations of the United States Government is sound.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCK. Not just now. I will yield in just a moment. During the course of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee Mr. Gerard Swope, president of the General Electric Co., testified in reference to the manner in which the old-age reserve account funds were invested:

Mr. Swore. Nor have I any fears that these funds in the hands of the Government are in any sense unsecure.

Later, Mr. McCormack asked him:

You do not consider that the investment of the money in such obligations is embezzlement, legalistic or otherwise?

Mr. Swope. Certainly not. It is a shame to so designate it.

Dr. J. Douglas Brown, of Princeton University, said:

There has been a great deal of talk about the mishandling of funds, and fraud. I think that is an entire misconception. I think the Treasury is performing its functions exactly and with the greatest integrity it has followed out the law as passed by Congress.

Mr. Marion B. Folsom, treasurer, Eastman Kodak Co., said, in answer to a query by Mr. Cooper, of Tennessee, who asked the question:

I don't understand you to be offering any criticism of the methods employed up to now?

No, sir, I do not. I do think there has been an awful lot of criticism of the handling of these funds which has not been at all just fied.

Dr. Paul Studenski, professor of economics, New York University, said:

I don't conceive that the investment of these funds of the Social Security in Government bonds are merely investments in Government I O U's, or that we need to be very much worried about it. I have deep faith in the future of the credit of the Federal Government despite the extensive borrowing that the Federal Government is engaged in.

Dr. Edwin E. Witte, professor of economics, University of Wisconsin, and formerly executive director, President's Committee on Economic Security, said—and I want you to listen to this, gentlemen:

I will put it this way: That you cannot find among economists or financiers or anybody who understands the operations of finance or governmental finance a person who thinks that these funds are lost to the beneficiaries. They are, on the contrary, the most secure investment you can have.

It is remarkable that among those who are familiar with financial operations of business corporations, those who understand governmental finance and those whose opinions as economists are most valued that there should be unanimity of opinion. This unanimity ought to satisfy and silence those who are misrepresenting the past financial operations of the Government and who seek for some ulterior purpose that I do not profess to know, to discredit the value of the securities that the United States Government issues. As of December 31, 1938, Federal trust funds such as the civil service retirement and disability fund, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, Indian trust funds, the Postal Savings System, Alien Property Custodian funds, and many others, held as investments, bonds of the United States Government, or bonds the payment of which was guaranteed by the United States Government, a total in face value amounting to $5,032,381,290. All of these bonds and obligations are just as much and just as little, I O U's as those the gentleman from California [Mr. GEARHART] complained about this afternoon. These investments are absolutely safe, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack] pointed out, and are of the soundest possible character.

Mr. Chairman, I have been advised that there may be amendments offered tomorrow to delete from the bill the paragraphs which the committee has reported, defining agricultural labor, and bringing American seamen under the coverage provisions of old-age insurance. I should like to say a word first with reference to the reasons that actuated the committee in bringing those who are employed in maritime employment under the act.

We realize that this is still a very difficult problem so far as unemployment compensation is concerned. For example, there is the question of how long a seaman should be required to wait unemployed before he becomes entitled to unemployment compensation. Those who are familiar with the maritime industry will know what I mean when I say that when a seaman goes to a hiring hall his name appears at the bottom of the list and he has to work his way up. It is not, therefore, fair to the employer or to anyone else to say that he should have necessarily the same period of waiting that a man who is out of employment in general industry should have. We are not, however, touching that problem here. We have decided to bring seamen under the old-age provisions of the act, leave the question of unemployment compensation for future consideration. May I say that the committee is very hopeful that this latter portion of the problem may also be worked out in the near future. I understand that someone has objected to the wording in our bill because we have said that those engaged in maritime employment on American vessels shall be covered irrespective of citizenship.

Mr. Chairman, this language refers to any employee, and to any employer as well. The man who works in the Ford factory in Michigan, the man who works in the cannery in California, is building up his old-age record regardless of the fact that he is an American citizen, and regardless of whether he is employed by one. The phrase is particularly necessary as to seamen.

The inclusion of the phrase is necessary since most of the services performed on martime vessels, with respect to which the taxes will apply, will be performed outside the United States. The courts might consider the levying of such taxes to be beyond the normal and usual exercise of the taxing power, and give the statute a narrower construction unless the intent is stated expressly.

The courts examine closely the intent to tax where the tax may be applied outside the United States. In United States v. Goelet ((1914) 232 U.S. 293), regarding the tax on the use of foreign-built yachts, the court said at page 296:

Not in the slightest degree questioning that there was power to impose the excise duty on the citizen owning a foreign-built yacht wholly irrespective of the fact that he was permanently domiciled in a foreign country and putting out of view all questions concerning the nonapplication of the statute to the case in hand purely because of the situs of the yacht itself, the single matter for decision is, do the terms of the statute provide for the payment by a citizen of the United States who has a permanent residence and domicile abroad of an excise duty because of the use by him as owner or charterer under the terms of the statute of a foreign-built yacht? * * * Indeed we think it must be cona foreign-built yacht? * * * Indeed we think it must be conceded that the levy of such a tax is so beyond the normal and usual exercise of the taxing power, as to cause it to be, when exerted, of rare occurrence and in the fullest sense exceptional. This being true, we must approach the statute for the purpose of ascertaining whether its provisions sanction such rare and exceptional taxation. Considering the text [of the law], we search in vain for the express declaration of such authority. True, it is argued by the United States, that as the tax is levied on any citizen using a foreign-built yacht and as any includes all, therefore the statute expressly embraces a citizen permanently domicitizen using a foreign-built yacht and as any includes all, therefore the statute expressly embraces a citizen permanently domiciled and residing abroad. But this argument in effect begs the question for decision which is whether the use of the general words, any citizen, without more should be considered as expressing more than the general rule of taxation, or in other words can be treated without the expression of more as embracing the exceptional exertion of the power to tax one permanently residing abroad.

The court held that the tax in that case did not apply to a citizen having a permanent residence and domicile abroad. In view of the foregoing statements of the court, it seems wise to include the phrase in the definition of employment for purposes of the old-age insurance provisions of law, since it is our intent to levy the taxes on services performed outside the United States on American vessels.

The definition of "employment" for purposes of the Federal unemployment tax will still cover only services performed within the United States, and is not extended to include maritime service. It is necessary, however, to insert in that definition the phrase "irrespective of the citizenship or residence of the employer or employee" in order not to raise a doubt as to the intention with regard to service performed within the United States. If the phrase appears in the definition of employment for old-age insurance purposes, but is left out in the definition for purposes of the Federal unemployment tax, it might be contended that an alien or nonresident employer or employee is not subject to the tax, even though the services are performed within the United States.

There has been some question as to how large a percentage of our seamen are American citizens, and those who, perhaps, will move to strike out this section may dwell on this subject tomorrow. I have, therefore, for your information obtained a letter from the Department of Commerce, which I desire to read at this point:

JUNE 1, 1939.

Hon. Frank H. Buck,

Hon. Frank H. Buck,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Congressman Buck: This will acknowledge your letter of May 30, 1939, addressed to the Secretary of Commerce, in which you desire information as to the percentage of American citizens you desire information as to the percentage of American citizens engaged in the maritime trade.

Statistics for the fiscal year 1938, now being prepared in the Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, show that seamen, excluding licensed officers, shipped before shipping commissioners were 90.1 percent Americans. We do not have compiled a breakdown on the percentage of Americans shipped in the intercoastal, Great Lakes, and foreign trade. However, the Great Lakes trade is not included in the above percentage, inasmuch as the crews on the Great Lakes ships did not sign on before a shipping commissioner and the Bureau's figures are compiled from shipping commissioners' reports. commissioners' reports.

You might be interested in the following figures on the per-centage of Americans shipped before shipping commissioners in previous years:

Percent ___ 86.0 83.4 80.6 Fiscal year 1933_.

I shall be pleased to furnish any further information you may desire on this subject. Cordially yours,

J. M. JOHNSON, Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

It will be observed that in the foregoing letter the total is not broken down by divisions; and I may say parenthetically also that practically all Great Lakes seamen are American citizens.

Obviously the maritime industry of the United States is on the way to be a 100-percent American labor industry, and it seems to me that in view of the fact there has been no opposition on the part of employers, and that the employees in this industry have requested inclusion, that no objection should be made when less than 10 percent of those now employed are aliens. Certainly there must be more than 10 percent aliens employed in great industrial establishments, such as the Ford Motor Co.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield. Mr. CULKIN. May I say that I concur heartily in the gentleman's conclusions and statements. I know of nothing that will stabilize the offshore marine industry to a greater extent than their placement under social security. I think the gentleman's committee has done a splendid job in this particular, and I agree with the gentleman's reasoning in full.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. Mr. EATON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

cluded. Is that correct?

Mr. EATON of California. Are stevedores already included under social security?

Mr. BUCK. I understand they already are included.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. The gentleman from California has referred to the fact that 10 percent aliens are included. Personally I question the inclusion of 10 percent. As I understand it, there are 200,000 seamen to be taken in under this amendment. This would mean 20,000 aliens would be in-

Mr. BUCK. The pending bill proposes to extend coverage to service performed "on or in connection with an American vessel under a contract of service which is entered into within the United States or during the performance of which the vessel touches at a port in the United States if the employee is employed on and in connection with such vessel when outside the United States." We define "American vessel" as any vessel documented or numbered under the laws of the United States and also any vessel neither documented nor numbered under the laws of the United States if its crew is employed solely by one or more citizens or residents of the United States or corporations organized under its laws.

According to the testimony given by George E. Bigge, Commissioner, Social Security Board, documented vessels cover 183,000 people; that is about 8,000 on yachts of one kind or another, 20,000 on fishing vessels, about 90,000 in deep-sea fishing, and 43,000 on rivers and local craft.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Might I state to the gentleman that every merchant marine in the world—the French, the German, the Italian, and the English-have had social security and oldage retirement for their offshore men for an indefinite period, and it has had a tremendously beneficial stabilizing influence upon the industry. I think we need that particularly here in the offshore industry in America.

Mr. BUCK. As a matter of fact, if we did not include both the aliens and the Americans there would be a tendency for employers to hire aliens up to the limit the law allows.

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; but the limit is extremely low. I will not attempt to say what it is, but aliens in the American offshore service are a vanishing factor and they will be practically eliminated within 2 or 3 years.

Mr. BUCK. I understand so.

Mr. CULKIN. And may I say, if the gentleman will permit, that one of the preliminaries to a man's going on an American ship is that he shall have first papers.

Mr. BUCK. I am sorry; I cannot yield further to the gentleman, but I thank him for his valuable contribution.

I want now to take up the amendment that the committee has prepared defining agricultural labor. I am advised that one Member of the House tomorrow will offer an amendment striking out the exemption for agricultural labor, for employees of religious, charitable, and other organizations, and for those engaged in domestic service. If that is not adopted, I am advised that an amendment will then be offered to reject the paragraph the committee has prepared after much thoughtful consideration defining agricultural labor. I understand this amendment comes from very reputable labor sources. I regret they have seen fit to suggest that such an amendment should be offered. I can only say that I have been very proud myself to have been of assistance, for instance, in connection with this inclusion of seamen in the act on behalf of organized labor. I have had labor support invariably in my election contests, and I look back with pride upon my association with organized labor. I think, however, when organized labor attempts to step into the agricultural field without a realization of the economic situation of the farmer, it is not taking into consideration all of those elements which we as members of the committee have had before us for a period of some months.

Mr. Chairman, agricultural labor was exempted in the original act, and it was exempted upon a sound basis. There is a reasonable basis for continuing this exemption, and the committee so found unanimously. Farmers cannot pass on their tax cost as the industrialist can on his pay roll. May I say also, speaking as a farmer, that farm life offers its own kind of social security. Its work is outdoors. It does not have the nervous strain that is bound to come as a result of association with machinery. It offers under modern rules and regulations good living conditions everywhere. The young man is employed at an early age, and I may say to those of you who come from the city that we take care of a great many of your older men who have passed out of the picture as far as industry is concerned but who can still earn an honest, respectable living on the farm. Its social security is its own. Its problems are not those of industry; the farmer cannot be judged nor can agricultural labor be judged by the same standards as industrial employer and employee.

The exemption contained in the original act is justified and should be continued. The clarifying paragraphs that the Ways and Means Committee has put into this bill are merely for the purpose of interpreting the original decision of Congress that agricultural labor should be exempt. These paragraphs are based on the theory that what is agricultural labor is determined by the nature of the work and not by whom the man is employed. Agricultural labor starts with the planting of a crop. It ends when that crop has been delivered to market or to a carrier for transportation to market, and all the intervening steps should be regarded as in the nature of agricultural labor.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. May I direct attention to the bottom of page 51?

May I offer a tribute to the work of the gentleman from California in connection with clearing up a misunderstanding that seems to have existed in the Treasury Department in its interpretation of the will of Congress as outlined in the Social Security Act.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. In that connection I will go into the matter further when the gentleman is ready to yield. Mr. BUCK. The gentleman may propound his question and perhaps I can answer it as I proceed.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I find at the bottom of page 51 the following sentence:

Services performed on a farm in connection with the raising, feeding, and management of fur-bearing animals, such as foxes, not now exempted, will be exempt under paragraph 1.

At the bottom of page 53 I find the following:

The term, for example, includes fur-bearing animal farms. Under the present law, services performed in connection with the operation of such farms constitute covered employment.

As a matter of fact, is it not true that that is simply an interpretation of the law by the Treasury Department and is not covered in the law itself?

Mr. BUCK. I think the gentleman is correct in his conclusions. The law clearly exempts "agricultural labor." Our difficulty has been to make the Treasury understand what "agricultural labor" is. I would like to develop that in connection with two or three other rulings the Treasury Department has made, if the gentleman does not mind.

Frankly, I think the time will come when both charitable institutions, educational institutions, and agriculture will feel that their employees ought to be included under at least the old-age provisions of this act; but I think a great deal of education is necessary before these classes of employers and the employees can see the benefits of this.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I agree with the gentleman and I am in harmony with his views on that subject.

Mr. BUCK. It will be recalled that there was only one man who appeared before our committee asking that agricultural labor be included. I say frankly he did not make a good impression on the committee. Am I correct?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Entirely correct.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances I think the committee has acted wisely in presenting this amendment to you to clear up what agricultural labor means. In our opinion the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and I invite the particular attention of the gentleman from Michigan to this, in issuing its regulations for the collection of social-security taxes produced a great many conflicting and in my opinion ridiculous rules and regulations. One of them is the one to which the gentleman referred, having to do with fur-bearing animal farms. The Bureau of Biological Survey in the Department of Agriculture classifies farms of that type as agricultural. There is no question about that.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Is it not the gentleman's opinion that the Congress never intended the operation of a fur-bearing farm to be anything other than an agricultural pursuit?

Mr. BUCK. Of course, that is exactly so.

Let me call attention to some of the other rulings. In some cases the rulings have worked to the advantage of farmers who have large acreage. I stated a few minutes ago that I am a farmer. I have a fairly large acreage, and on it I have a packing plant where I can clean, wash, and pack my own fruit.

That labor is exempt. If 10 or 20 of my neighbors do the same thing in the same way, if they get together and build a cooperative packing shed on the railroad and wash their apples or their pears, and pack their fruit and use the same type of labor under the same circumstances, they are now taxed under the rulings of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, because the work is done off of a farm. Where is the justice in that, in making the small producer suffer?

Let us consider the question of poultry. Under the ruling of the Bureau, if you raise poultry for the purpose of selling eggs or selling the fowl themselves to market and you employ labor, that is agricultural labor. On the other hand, if you employ labor to raise baby chicks, that is not agricultural labor. If you raise mushrooms out in a shed back of the house on your farm and employ labor, that is agricultural labor, but if you have a natural cave back of your house and raise them there and employ someone to harvest them, that is not agricultural labor.

Let me add that the Pure Food and Drugs Act of the United States and many State laws require rigid inspection of agricultural commodities, and in the case of apples and pears require that they be washed before they can be shipped in interstate commerce. The average farmer is in no position to handle this work by himself on his farm. He must cooperate with his neighbors in a common packing plant where his fruit can be washed, his beans graded and cleaned, and so on. All these processes are a part of the preparation of the farm crop for market, and it has been unfair and inequitable for the Bureau of Internal Revenue to make rulings which tend to restrict all of these operations to a given farm. Their rulings have worked to the advantage of those who have large acreages on which they can carry through a complete agricultural operation from producing a crop to delivering for transportation to market. It might be very fairly said the present amendment is intended not merely to state clearly what Congress considers are agricultural operations but to remove the inequities that now exist.

The changes which we present to you have been worked out with members of the Legislative Counsel, representatives of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and with counsel for the Social Security Board. I can state to you quite truthfully that the Treasury Department has assured the Ways and Means Committee that the definition proposed is one which they find workable.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HAWKS. In connection with the sentences to which the gentleman from Michigan called attention, I wonder if the fur farmers who have been paying these taxes under the language used in the report will receive any repayment?

Mr. BUCK. I cannot tell the gentleman that. I will say this much, that in the opinion of those of us who helped to draw this amendment these various services which form an integral part of agriculture were intended to be covered by Congress in its original enactment; but, frankly, I cannot tell the gentleman what the situation would be in regard to the problem there.

Mr. HAWKS. It is not quite fair that they should have been taxed purely under a regulation issued by the Depart-

Mr. BUCK. I take it that they have their recourse to the courts under those circumstances; there is no question about that.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, these people who have been construed to be under covered employment and whose wage record has been built up will still be there. If they go into other covered employment they get the benefit of that.

Mr. HAWKS. How about the employers' contribution,

Mr. COOPER. Of course, the employers' tax has been paid. They do not get any refund. The tax is not being paid for the benefit of the employers but for the benefit of the employees.

Mr. HAWKS. But they would have to get out of this employment.

Mr. BUCK. I am sorry. I cannot yield further on this fur-bearing proposition. I wish to call attention to one or two other matters before my time expires.

Let me call attention to another serious anomaly. If you are the owner of a farm, and you enter into a written agreement with a marketing agent to pick and pack your crop. whether it is fruit or beans or anything else, the labor employed by the marketing agent is considered to be agricultural labor at the present time; but if you sell your fruit or beans to that same marketing agent and he comes in with a crew and picks your crop, that is not agricultural labor under the rulings of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Services performed by the employees of a company handling tobacco in warehouses off the farm but in the immediate neighborhood where the process of fermentation was carried on, however, have been held to be agricultural, so that the Treasury has applied no uniform rule in connection with its idea of limiting agricultural labor to work on the farm. In the case of cotton ginning, packing lettuce, and so forth, however, a very rigid restriction has been made limiting the exemption to work done on a farm itself.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. These curious distinctions produce inequities among people operating in the same commodities in the same localities, and certainly this is an injustice. Now, assuming there is merit to what I said about the reason for the exemption of agricultural labor until such time as both employers and employees have been educated to the point where they will want to be included—and, after all, you want these people to be included just as you have wanted the seamen who have come to us asking to be included under this act—then we ought to have this clarifying amendment, this defining amendment which is based on the theory that it is not by whom a man is employed but the nature of the work he is doing that constitutes it agricultural labor.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire to discuss briefly the subject of the "liberalizing" amendments that have been suggested by some of the Representatives who come from States that are not matching the present Federal old-age assistance contribution. I have some hesitancy in going into this subject, because, as has been pointed out, the State of California is the only State that is now fully matching the contributions that the Government makes. I am satisfied, however, that whether or not ours is the only State that can do that or will do it, the equal matching principle is the sound principle on which Federal contributions should be made. Once we start paying two-thirds of the first $15, as has been suggested, and half of the rest, or matching at the rate of 4 to 1 for the benefit of certain States, it will not be long until all the States will come to you and ask you for a flat, a uniform, and a universal pension of the kind you voted down here the other day. There are reasons, which I shall insert in the RECORD, for rejecting any such proposal of a uniform or universal basis.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not a fact that if a change in the ratio of 50-50 should be made it would simply add to the expense of the Government and in no way benefit the aged people we are expecting to aid?

Mr. BUCK. That is my opinion. May I say that while this does not appear in the records, in the executive sessions Dr. Altmeyer stated that if we should adopt a proposal such as having the Federal Government pay two-thirds of the first $15 and half of the remainder it would increase the tax cost to the United States by from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year.

This is on the basis of a $30 top matching. If we take the $40 top matching that the committee has recommended, the cost would be from $45,000,000 to $110,000,000 a year. The 4-to-1 matching proposal will cost the Federal Government an additional $220,000,000 per year.

Mr. Chairman, our committee is a hard-working committee. We have a great many things to consider, but, fundamentally, we are charged with raising the revenue for the country through taxation. When you vote on these so-called liberalizing proposals, remember that the next week you are going to be called upon to tax your people to pay for them. There is no alternative whatsoever. We cannot go on borrowing indefinitely; we will not do so, and we are going to have to bring in a tax bill that will wring the money out of the pockets of whom? Of those who are prepared to produce in the next generation and who are engaged in active business today in order to make these unreasonable pension payments to the States whose legislators themselves refuse to provide the funds which are necessary to take care of the States' responsibilities to their own aged. I am not insensible of the difficulties that some of our States have in providing for social aid, but I have noticed that whenever it is necessary for any State to match other Federal appropriations such as those made for roads, the States have always been able to find the necessary money. I am afraid that some of those who are urging these excessive payments are forgetting that after all it is the right of the State to determine how far it wants to go in social insurance. When the Federal Government holds up the standard, be it $30 a month or $40 a month, and says that it will match up to half that amount, any money that a State provides, in my opinion, the Federal Government has extended an invitation sufficiently broad and sufficiently liberal, and until the time comes when the States take advantage of that invitation the Congress should not go further by authorizing larger subsidies which must be borne by the taxpayers on top of the already tremendous load of taxes under which they are staggering.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I desire to insert a portion of the testimony of Dr. Altmeyer, to be found at page 2306 of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee:

Dr. ALTMEYER. The approach in the Social Security Act, as you know, is twofold. Title I undertakes to set up a systematic, orderly method of helping old people who are in need. But the benefits are in proportion to their needs.

The States have very wide freedom, in fact, entire freedom, in determining what the definition of the concept of need shall be, since that is not laid down in the Federal Social Security Act.

Therefore a State is in a position to determine, in the light of its resources, its habits, its customs, just what aid shall be granted these aged people, and under what circumstances.

That gives us a flexible system; that, in a country of this magnitude, with its varying conditions, is absolutely essential for a decent, equitable, and adequate treatment of this problem of need, which varies with the individual's circumstances.

The House very decisively defeated the Townsend proposal the other day. What the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] and the others who have spoken as he spoke are proposing to do is simply to open up the back door to Townsendism and to invite its proponents back to make a raid on the Capitol instead of sending them to the State legislatures, whose members they should deal with first of all.

I insert an extract from an editorial in the Washington Post of June 6, 1939, which states this quite clearly:

THROUGH THE BACK DOOR

At present the Social Security Board matches old-age allowances by the States on a 50-50 basis. Thus, the system retains a ances by the States on a 50-50 basis. Thus, the system retains a very definite local character. States are not likely to promise extravagant benefits so long as their taxpayers are required to meet half of the bill. Senator Byrnes proposes, however, that the Federal Government increase its contribution to two-thirds of the total pension allowed in the poorer States.

Acceptance of that principle for some States would, of course, quickly lead to demands for its general application. The next step might easily be a wholly Federal system of old-age pensions, in order to equalize the differences of which Senator Byrnes complains. The Townsendites would then have only to bring about liberalization of Federal old-age benefits to arrive, by a delayed approach, at the goal they seek.

approach, at the goal they seek.

When the House begins debate on the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act today it must be alive to the very real danger of ushering in Townsendism through the back door.

I also want to call the committee's attention to an editorial which appeared in the Washington News of June 7, 1939, on the same subject. I quote the following from that editorial. While the reference made is to a plan proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Byrnes], its application is equally pertinent to the Colmer plan and others which we have before us today.

KEEP SOCIAL SECURITY SECURE

The proposed social-security law changes now being debated in Congress are recommended by the House Ways and Means Committee which has made a long and careful study and has considered the views of many experts.

We believe these changes are desirable and safe. Under them, payment of old-age insurance benefits would start next year, instead of in 1942; increased benefits would be extended to wives, widows, and dependents of insured persons; about 1,100,000 more people would be taken in under the law's insurance provisions; the plan to build up a $47,000,000,000 reserve fund would be abandoned; pay-roll tax increases would be postponed, saving employers and employees about $1,700,000,000 in the next 5 years; and the and employees about $1,700,000,000 in the next b years; and the system would be liberalized in other respects.

But some Congressmen want to go even further. For instance, Senator Byrnes, of South Carolina, and others think the Federal Government should be more generous in the matter of old-age pensions toward the 30 States whose people have per capita incomes lower than the average for the whole country.

At present the Federal Government contributes half the cost of such respices, up to $20,000 month total. Most States have pensions.

such pensions, up to $30 a month total. Most States pay pensions of much less than $30 a month—the country-wide average is below $20—because they can't or won't match the full $15 which the Federal Government is willing to provide. The Ways and Means Committee proposes to increase the maximum Federal grant to $20, making it possible for any State which will put up an equal amount to pay $40 pensions.

This won't help those very poor States which now fall far short of $15-a-month contributions. South Carolina, for example, pays an average pension of only $7.79, and Arkansas of only $6.05. Nine States, all in the South, are below $10.50.

So Senator Byrnes' plan is to have a sliding scale, with the Federal grants varying from half the total pension in "rich" States to as much as two-thirds in States whose per capita incomes are farthest below the national average, chiefly Southern States.

farthest below the national average, chiefly Scuthern States.

We appreciate the gravity of the problem Senator Byenes is trying to attack. But we also appreciate the realities of politics, one of which is that what some States get from Congress all States will demand. If the Federal Government starts paying two-thirds the cost of old-age pensions in South Carolina, Arkansas, and other "poor" States, it will soon pay two-thirds the cost in every State.

Another reality of politics is this: That the larger the proportion of Federal contribution to a system administered by the States the less interest will the States have in keeping administration wise the less interest will the States have in keeping administration wise and economical. Local taxpayers are notoriously indifferent to waste of "money from Washington."

We think there are many States now paying low old-age pensions which could afford to pay more under the present arrangement. They should be encouraged to do that. We know there ment. They should be encouraged to do that. We know there are poverty-stricken States whose economic condition should be improved. But the Byrnes proposal, it seems to us, would actually contribute very little toward that end, while at the same time it would threaten serious damage to social security's entire old-age pension system.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to every Member of this House, when they vote upon the Colmer amendment, to think not of their own local problem, but to think in terms of the United States and of those people at the end of the line of taxation who will be called upon to make good any increases that are voted over and above those fair and liberal ones that the Ways and Means Committee has already made. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the closing remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] with reference to not changing the proportions that the Government now pays in old-age assistance.

Under the present law, the Government pays half of what the States pay out, up to $30 a month. Under the bill which is now under discussion, the Ways and Means Committee has increased the amount from a $30 maximum to a $40 maximum, with the State matching equally the Federal Gov-This increase to $40 is a mere gesture. If the Congress has a sincere desire to assist the aged people of the country by making a substantial contribution, then I say that the increase from $30 to $40 with the present ratio does not mean anything. The important matter to consider in the contribution of the Federal Government is how much it will contribute toward the first $30 of the total amount of the old-age assistance.

In March of this year I introduced a bill, H. R. 5038, which changes the proportion of the contribution of the Federal Government. Under the present bill now under consideration, the Federal Government reimburses the State for onehalf of the pension payments, not counting anything above $40. Based on title I of my bill, at the proper time I shall introduce an amendment which would change this basis in the following particulars: The $40 maximum in the bill would be increased to $45, and this increased figure would be divided into three $15 brackets, the first $15 paid to any individual for any month to be on the basis of $2 of Federal money to $1 of State money; the second $15 on the basis of $1 of Federal money to $1 of State money, or in equal proportions; and the third bracket of $15 on the basis of $1 contributed by the Federal Government to $2 contributed by the State.

This change would accomplish the following desirable results: It would enable those States which are now paying very low and insufficient pensions to raise their payments to a more reasonable level. Federal funds would go into the various States on a much more uniform basis than at present, because the poorer States could be expected at least to take full advantage of the more favorable matching up to $15. At present a disproportionate amount of Federal money is going into the richer states. The decreased matching ratio, from the standpoint of the Federal Government, recognizes that as these payments increase, the Federal payment of pensions should decrease. In this way the old citizens of all the States-the wealthier States and the poorer States-would have the same basic sum, and the States could then add to that basic sum under the second and third brackets with a diminishing responsibility on the part of the Federal Government. Under the present method, only one State, California, exceeds the $30 maximum with $32.46, followed by Massachusetts with $28.57, and Colorado with $28.12. Nine States are below $10.50. The average pension of all the States is $19.27, and this in spite of the willingness of the Federal Government to pay one-half of the pension up to $30. Raising the maximum amount from $30 to $40 does not do the old people of the poorer States any good when these States cannot come anywhere near matching the amount the Government is now offering. To raise the amount to $40 merely emphasizes the vast disparity between the assistance that can be afforded the citizens of the different States.

As compared with a pension of $32.43 paid in California, my State, Arkansas, pays $6.15 per month to its old people. This means, of course, that the Federal Government advances to Arkansas about $3.08 for each eligible person, while it advances $15 per month to each eligible person in California—nearly five times as much as it contributes for the citizens of Arkansas.

This great disparity does not exist because Arkansas wants its old people to have inadequate assistance, but simply because Arkansas has not the taxable wealth on which to base a larger proportion of assistance to its citizens. It is not because Arkansas is unwilling to tax itself to provide social services for its people. Arkansas has placed upon itself about every kind of a tax that the ingenuity of man can devise-and yet we fall far short of measuring up to the average of the Nation. The wealth is not there. In addition to the Federal income tax, we pay a State income tax. We also have a sales tax and an occupation tax. Our real-estate tax rate is nearly three times that of the District of Columbia, and in order to keep our public schools going we have a voluntary 18-mill school tax which the various school districts assess upon themselves-in addition to the regular millage. We have a road tax and one of the highest gas taxes in the country.

There are many other taxes too numerous to recount in this brief time. I am mentioning these things to show that Arkansas is not trying to dodge its full responsibility in the matter of finding sources of revenue. And Arkansas is not the only State that is unable to find taxable wealth sufficient to provide a reasonable pension for its old people without adequate Federal assistance.

It is rather revealing to see that the per capita income of the United States in 1935 was $432, while that of Arkansas was $182. That of Mississippi was $170, and Alabama $189.

Many other States in the north, east, west, and south are also laboring under the handicap of insufficient taxable wealth.

Arkansas has had fine forests which have been cut down, to the enrichment of outside ownership. We have the largest deposits of bauxite in the country, but the wealth produced from this source has swelled the coffers of another State.

I am asking the members of the committee to give the people of the poorer States the chance to have not $200 per month, as was attempted last week by some of our friends, but merely an amount that will assure the old people of the Nation, east, west, north, and south, some reasonable modicum of comfort as they pass over the brow of the hill and face the setting sun. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, today when I picked up a very reliable weekly newspaper published here in Washington—the United States News—I saw that the Federal tax collections in 1930 were $3,600,000,000; that in 1938 it rose to $6,800,000,000; and in 1939 it reached $6,100,000,000. It further states that the amount now needed to balance the Budget is $9,700,000,000. Expenditures have trebled and taxes have doubled since 1929. This is not a record for any party, Republican or Democratic, to be proud of, but this spending orgy did not start with this administration, with the Coolidge administration or the Harding administration or the Hoover administration. This orgy started when the States threw away their birthright in 1913 and ratified the sixteenth amendment without a floor or a ceiling, releasing to the Federal Government the unlimited right to tax the States' citizens; that is when it started, and when the Federal Government began this orgy the States followed suit and the local governments followed the bad example of the Federal Government.

In 1937 the total governmental expenditures for State, local, and Federal Government in the United States was $17,300,000,000, and in that year all the States west of the Mississippi had an income of only $17,600,000,000.

The question is whether we are going to continue along this line. My remarks will be related to that question and, specifically, to the proposals made by fine gentlemen whose views I respect, who are suggesting that we violate the time-honored and, apparently, sound governmental principle of matching the States equally with respect to Federal sums.

We should keep in mind that there is not enough money in the United States, if we were to make a capital levy on every dollar's worth of property in the Nation, to satisfy the demands of all the humanitarian purposes that somebody could suggest that we carry on.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-four Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The Committee rose; and Mr. RAYBURN having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Warren, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6635, and finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, when 312 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the names of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. | DISNEY] is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma 3 additional minutes.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, to discuss this whole proposition in 15 minutes is extremely difficult, but I shall do the best I can. I had made only some preliminary remarks when the point of order was made that there was no quorum present, and I think at the expense of boring those good people who were here when I started, I shall retrace my steps to some extent.

This morning I picked up the United States News, and I saw a very interesting chart in it, which I am sure is a reliable one, because this newspaper is factual in its statements. According to its chart, in 1930 we had a tax collection of $3,600,000,000; in 1938 there was a tax collection of $6,800,000,000, and in 1939, $6,100,000,000; and the statement is made in that chart that in order to balance the Federal Budget it would take $9,700,000,000. The proposal that I intend to discuss here would add, according to its own proponents, about $220,000,000. I do not suppose their estimates are any higher than they can justify under the circumstances, but that is what is involved in money. In my opinion, as a Democrat, I express the idea that the best speech that is being made nowadays on the floor of this House is being made by a certain Republican. It consists of eight words, "Where are you going to get the money?" This spending orgy is not a partisan matter. It did not begin in this administration. It became more accentuated because our economic difficulties grew to be greater.

It did not begin in the Coolidge administration, it did not begin in the Hoover administration, but it started when your State and my State threw away their right to control the Federal Government to some extent in matters of taxation when these States ratified the sixteenth amendment without floor or ceiling. Then is when the orgy began, and how long it will continue depends, in my judgment, upon what the States will finally do to stop it, and not upon what we will do here. Congress apparently is going to continue to spend until somebody some place, somewhere, halts us.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat, there is not enough money in these United States, if we were to make a capital levy on every dime's worth of property in the country, to meet all of the humanitarian needs that some person or group of persons or some official group of people, maybe departmental bureaucrats, might suggest. There is not enough money in America to do it. It is not a question nowadays, apparently, of what the people need in the demands that are made upon us; it is not a question of what this Nation can afford. We appear to be trying to give the people what they want and not what they necessarily need. Last week, by a decisive vote, we invited the Townsend people to go back to the States, where the responsibility primarily bolongs. At least, in my judgment, it belongs We invited them to go back to the States and, in effect, to see the legislatures. But the Terry-proposed amendment, and the Colmer-proposed amendment, and various other amendments here proposed this afternoon are simply invitations to the Townsend people to come back again and again and again, until finally the principle that we voted against the other day will be in effect here.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DISNEY. Not until I have concluded my statement.
I want to answer questions, but I want to conclude my statement first. The principle in the Townsend bill that was most unsound, in my judgment, was not the question of compulsory spending.

That could be taken care of some way. It is not a question of whether or not we pay people who need or do not need pensions. To my mind the question is whether or not the Federal Government is going to engage in paying pensions to the full extent, 100 percent. That is where the thing begins and ends. The other two elements, to me, are incidental to that main question.

Now, that is a policy we must determine. Under the sixteenth amendment we can continue taxing the people to any limit we see fit, until the States see fit to change such a system. I hope the Conferences of Governors will start something that will awaken us on that subject.

We can pension the old people to any amount and make the taxpayers pay any amount under the sixteenth amendment; we can pay them $100 a month, $200 a month, $500 a month, as we please, and we can raise the money. We can make the people take it. We cannot make them like it.

I discussed this with one gentleman from the South, in whose judgment I had the greatest respect. He said, "My State cannot pay any more. My State cannot possibly pay any more." With $45,000,000,000 piled up against the Nation, can the Nation pay any more than we are paying now? Can we possibly go any farther? Are we not in the same condition our colleague's State is in, with 10,000,000 people out of work, and while we are taxing business all the more and thereby preventing business, at least to that extent, from putting more men to work? Can we go any farther? I repeat, taxes have doubled and expenditures trebled in 10 years. Where is the saturation point? Can we make it any more emphatic about the Nation than he made it about his State? Maybe those States are not matching. Maybe they can match what we offer them. I think some of them can come more nearly matching what has been offered by the Federal Government than they are doing, but why should they do so when in Congress we propose to go to two-thirds or four-fifths? What incentive is there on the part of the States to match 50-50 when we here today are discussing matching two-thirds, four-fifths, or even seven-eighths?

Oh, gentlemen may say, "You on the Ways and Means Committee raised the matching limit to $20, which was just a gesture. That was a hoax." What if we had left it at $15, what becomes of your argument then? If we had left it at $15, where is the hoax in that? When you propose to go to two-thirds or four-fifths that is not any argument. This $9,700,000,000 deficit is what is involved. The proponents of this amendment admit that at the low figure $220,000,000 is the cost of their plan. This committee amendment in the bill is an invitation to the people who believe in old-age pensions to go back to the States where a part of this responsibility belongs, and where the responsibility will not be accepted as long as we flirt with the idea of matching the States more than 50-50.

All down the years of our history we have felt that when the Federal Government should go a certain length in appropriations where a local proposition was involved, the Federal Government's furnishing one-half was sufficient, and there ought to be responsibility on the part of the States to furnish the other half. Now, as I said, the other day we invited the proponents of the Townsend bill to go back to where the responsibility really lies. Today it is proposed to invite them back to continue this pressure. The man who defeats you when you are running for office again, after you have voted for two-thirds, will be the man who promises to go to four-fifths or seven-eighths, or all the way to 100 percent. Surely gentlemen do not have to have it explained to them what difficulties are involved in the Federal Government paying the whole bill. How fragile a basis we are operating on when the Government pays it all. Three hundred and two to ninety-seven the other day said that was unsound. Many things were said about the bill being a monstrosity and un-American in its nature, but basically what we were voting on was whether or not this Government should pay the whole bill for old-age pensions. Personally I think the taxpayer has some rights in this thing. I think the man who pays his taxes is entitled to know that every man who is getting money from the Government is doing his share, because he is entitled to that right. When we launch into 100-percent spending for pensions for the aged, the next step is to pay them regardless of need, and the next step is to raise the rate of monthly payment. We can do it. Whether our Government can afford it or not, we can take the money away from the taxpayers by some process.

Now I am ready to answer any questions.

Mr. PATMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman one or two questions.

Mr. DISNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PATMAN. Under this proposed amendment to the social-security law offered by the committee, the Government will put up $20 by matching for every person over 65 years of age who is eligible under the State law. That is right, is it not?

Mr. DISNEY. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, the Colmer amendment, which many of us are supporting, provides only that a $20 Federal contribution will be made, but it commences at the bottom instead of at the top, and if all States take advantage of this amendment as proposed by the committee, the Federal Government will not be out one penny more if the Colmer amendment were adopted instead of the committee amendment.

Mr. DISNEY. I would be glad to have you explain that, in view of the $9,000,000,000 deficit, but you admitted a little while ago this would cost $220,000,000 additional annually, according to your own figures. I think it would be vastly

Mr. PATMAN. It would be exactly the same as the committee would have the Government pay, if the States take advantage of what you are offering them.

Mr. DISNEY. That may be a primary consideration, I may say to the gentleman from Texas, but to me the primary consideration is where we are headed in raising the payment.

Mr. PATMAN. I know, but the amount will not be in-

Mr. DISNEY. I do not agree with the gentleman. If the gentleman can explain that to the House, I would indeed be glad to have him do so.

Mr. PATMAN. The explanation is simple. If all the States take advantage of what is offered them in this bill and pay their old people $40 on a 50-50 basis, which is $20 for each old-age pensioner, that would be exactly the same amount that the Federal Government would pay if the Colmer amendment were adopted.

Mr. DISNEY. But the States have certain rights, and this is on the basis of what the committee felt the States had a right to do, to say how much or how little they would pay their old-age pensioners. That is one of the duties of citizenship.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. If we adopt the policy of the United States Government's matching 4 to 1 any pension scheme, will not the States have the same right to come back and ask us to match 4 to 1 on money for Federal-aid roads and other grants-in-aid that the Federal Government makes?

Mr. DISNEY. That follows logically.

Mr. TREADWAY. If in considering the pending bill we change the 50-50 provision as the committee recommends to a two-thirds and one-third provision, will the aged people get a cent additional money under the changed plan?

Mr. DISNEY. It does not seem to me that they would. Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I ask my colleague from Oklahoma, for whom I have great respect, whether it is not true that under the committee amendment he is actually proposing to work a hardship on the poorer States that will under no circumstances be able to match up the $20?

Mr. DISNEY. I do not think so.

A few days ago this House took courageous action in decisively rejecting the utterly inequitable and unsound plan for wholly Federal pensions. This action conclusively demonstrated that, so far as the Members of the House of Representatives are concerned, they place the welfare of their country and its citizens above any petty political advantage which they might personally gain by condoning a raid on the Treasury and a fraud upon the deserving old people of the Nation.

I am glad that the stand which we took upon that occasion grew out of earnest conviction on our part. For the threat of unwise action, which would be equally detrimental to the interests both of our elder citizens and of all citizens, is far from past. In fact, in some ways the danger is far greater at this minute than it was when we took our vote on the Townsend plan a few days ago. Then we faced an issue of which the fallacies were readily apparent. Today we run the risk of being drawn insensibly but inevitably into the quagmire of an equally impossible and equally fallacious pension scheme.

I refer to the proposals now being advanced for amending the Social Security Act to provide a Federal matching ratio for old-age assistance in excess of the 50 percent authorized by the existing law. Because the proposed amendments do not appear at first glance to suggest any radical departure from the principles already embodied in the Social Security Act, because they do appear at first glance to help the socalled poorer States, which, it is contended, cannot pay decent pensions to their needy old people, they have a specious plausibility. But beneath this plausibility, as I think I can prove to you, they are as impractical and as dangerous as those schemes which we have already rejected.

These proposals will involve excessive cost to our already burdened Federal Treasury. They will result in gross inequity as among the States. They will lead inevitably to a tremendous Federal bureaucracy. They will result finally in a straight out-and-out national old-age pension scheme, based neither on need nor economic loss. The ultimate complexity of the proposed scheme is such that it is bound to collapse under its own weight. And, what is more, it will fail completely in its avowed purpose of providing more adequately for the old people of this country.

Even the mildest of the proposals advanced would require the Federal Government to pay two-thirds of the first $15 to each recipient of old-age assistance plus one-half of any amount from $15 to $30. This would mean an increase in the Federal cost of old-age assistance ranging from forty to a hundred and ten million dollars annually, depending on the action taken by the several States. Other proposals which would necessitate still greater Federal expenditures have also been proposed. One of these would place upon the Federal Government as much as four-fifths of the entire burden of old-age assistance payments up to $25 per month. Another point to which I would like to call your attention is the fact that this estimate of an increase ranging from forty to a hundred and ten million dollars annually would apply only to the first few years. In future years we would have to anticipate that the amount required would be far in excess even of this.

I need not emphasize to the Members of this Congress the great difficulty we are now experiencing in raising the revenues necessary to meet present obligations. For the fiscal year 1940 our deficit will be three and one-third billion dollars. The total deficit over the emergency years since 1931 will come to $27,000,000,000. In view of the situation with which we have been confronted, these expenditures have been justified as emergency measures. As investments in the security and stability of the Nation they are sound and reasonable.

But how can we, in good conscience, now take a course of action which, I believe, will preclude any possibility of balancing our Budget within the predictable future? Yet that is precisely what the proponents of these bills are suggesting that we should do. The Ways and Means Committee is charged by this House with the responsibility for finding the money which the Federal Government needs to meet its obligations. I think it is worth noting that no one has asked this committee where the money to finance these additional Federal contributions to old-age pensions is to come from.

And, even if the Federal Government should undertake this colossal burden, it would not, in my opinion, be serving the ends toward which, it is said, these bills are directed. This action on the part of the Federal Government would not wipe out inequities in old-age assistance among the States. It would not put more money into the pockets of those needy old people who need it.

Assume for a moment that Congress was so short-sighted, so delinquent of its responsibilities as to pass such a measure. What would be the result? There are several alternatives, all equally objectionable. In the first place it should be noted that congressional action on this matter would be meaningless until the States also took action. However, there can be little doubt that they would do so. It seems more than likely that some of the States would utilize this Federal handout to effect an unjust reduction in their own proper obligations. If that is the case, the old people will not get 1 additional penny. Instead, what will probably happen is that the bulk of the increased contributions from the Federal Government will be used for the purpose of reducing State expenditures. In other words, the States may, if they so desire, take unfair advantage of this situation to balance their budgets at the expense of the Federal Government.

Some States, on the other hand, will, no doubt, go the limit in stretching payments to old people. In that case they will make demands upon the Federal Government for sums that will so far out-top present expenditures as to be well nigh incalculable.

Furthermore it is readily apparent that the rich States which can easily afford to pay as much or more than they are now providing for their old people will be the ones most likely to receive this gratuitous assistance from the Federal Treasury. The inequalities of such a scheme become more and more apparent when you consider that the taxpayers who contribute to Federal revenues are not limited to any one part of the country. We are all of us citizens of the United States, as well as of a particular State. Since far more than half of the Federal revenues are derived from taxes not levied in accordance with ability to pay, these schemes would really operate at the expense of the so-called poorer States.

I repeat, as the elected representatives of the American people, we have no right to permit the gross inequalities which any such measure would inevitably produce. Rather, we have an obligation to protect the best interests of all concerned—the Nation and its States, the old people and their fellow citizens who in the last analysis support both Federal and State activities.

There are only two ways in which any such proposal could assure that more money would actually reach the old people for whom it is intended. One way would be to freeze State expenditures at their present level, or in some States at a higher level than they are now paying. This could only result in a permanent distortion of State budgets and a permanent crippling of other equally urgent services, including schools, hospitals, and other essential protections of the general welfare. The other method would be to require a Federal contribution of a flat, minimum amount which would go to every recipient. This is impractical and inequitable. It would completely disregard the element of need and would give the same basic amount to an individual who had no income whatsoever and to one who had some resources of his own. It is as unjust to make equal provisions for unequal needs as it is to disregard wholly the requirements of those who are in want.

Another point to be considered is the vast and, I venture to say unmanageable, complexity of administration which would result from any such change. This is a matter, gentlemen, to which those who support this bill appear to have given little thought. Yet, I think I can establish all too readily the conclusion that the Federal Government would find itself involved in details of administration which would be alike objectionable from the point of view of the Government and of the people. One of the inevitable concomitants of increasing Federal contributions is increasing Federal supervision and control over disbursements. As a result we would find curselves, perhaps overnight, with an enormous Federal bureaucracy, which would be compelled to reach down into the homes of the individual recipients of assistance. Old-age insurance, which is federally operated, offers no such problem, because there payments to individuals are made on a basis of past earnings, and the Federal operations entailed are simply of a bookkeeping and accounting character. If the Federal Government extends its proportionate stake in old-age pensions, it must inevitably extend its proportionate concern in the individual needs of those receiving assistance.

One of the great safeguards of our present system of equal matching for old-age assistance is the fact that it is geared to give just consideration both to the national aspects and to the local aspects of the problem. I should be more than loath to see the Federal Government take any action which would weaken the local relationships so necessary, if an assistance program based on need is to have reality in the lives of individual men and women.

For all these reasons I believe that proposals to increase the percentage basis of Federal matching are unsound; that they would defeat the very purposes which are their avowed intention. In addition, I believe that they are wholly unnecessary. I recognize the serious financial problems with which some of our States are confronted. But I believe that the majority of the States can and will provide adequate pensions for their old people, and that they will do so vastly more effectively if they are not permitted to shift an undue share of the responsibility to the Federal Government.

I know what the situation is in my own State of Oklahoma. I am well aware of the difficulties which have been encountered there. Yet my State is paying pensions to a larger proportion of its elder citizens than any other State in the Union. So far it has been able to finance them; and it will, I believe, in the future be able to make its program still more adequate. I know that some of you may think, "Yes; but look at the amount paid in Oklahoma. Its old people don't get on the average quite $20 a month." But, even so, our average payment is higher than the average for the entire Nation.

Of course, the level of assistance in my State, as in many others, is still quite low. But, in considering these levels of assistance, these averages, we must remember that in every State they reflect a wide difference in the payments made to individuals. Many of the old people receiving aid in Oklahoma and in other States have some income from other sources, or they own their own homes. Others live in households where there are two or more persons, each receiving oldage assistance. In general, I believe it is fair to say that in most States small payments go to people who need only supplementary aid for such cash requirements as they cannot otherwise provide. These small payments bring down the average so that it does not give a really representative picture of the level of assistance now being generally provided.

Even so, as I just said, I believe that the States can and should work toward more adequate assistance within the present framework of the Social Security Act. In my State I believe that this objective can be attained without any net increase in cost. As you are all probably recalling at this moment, Oklahoma received considerable publicity a year ago because of failures both of omission and commission on the part of its old-age assistance administration. I would be the last to deny that there was truth in some of these charges. But, as Mark Twain said when notices of his death were published, "The reports in the papers have been considerably exaggerated."

Great progress has been and will continue to be made in Oklahoma in tightening up any laxness which may have existed in the initial stages of its program. And we are well on the way toward providing more adequate protection to those of our old people who are entitled to aid under the existing provisions of Federal and State laws. Oklahoma has had its share of criticism. I believe it is now entitled to a just recognition of its genuine concern for its aged citizens and of its determination as a State to meet its fair and full share of our responsibility toward them.

If this Congress reinforces the action it took on the Townsend plan, if it withstands as firmly the present insidious pressure to adopt equally unsound policies, I am certain that the whole future course of old-age security in this country will be brighter.

When no shred of doubt is left as to the position of the Federal Government, when the desires of some States to lift the whole burden off their own shoulders have been answered effectually, we shall find, I believe, that State legislatures will stop passing memorials urging Congress to take over their own duties. Instead they will become responsive to the legitimate demands made upon them by the citizens of their own States.

I hope that my plea to you today will not be taken as opposed to the interests of the old people or opposed to Nation-wide social legislation. My record on this score speaks for itself, and I am willing to stand on the consistency of my past and present action. I voted for the Social Security Act in 1935. I voted for all the bills sponsored by the administration with the purpose of promoting greater economic and social well-being for the people of the country. And I expect to continue to support the sound social programs which I feel confident will be developed by this administration and future administrations.

But for this very reason I cannot do otherwise than call to the attention of this Congress the dangers inherent in the proposals before us. I have every confidence that we shall not unwittingly support a program which would implicate us in untold difficulties. These measures, while plausible and trimmed with vote-getting attractions, are, I am convinced, detrimental to the interests of the old people and the citizens generally. They will make our task in this Congress and in future Congresses vastly more difficult. We have no right to involve ourselves and the people whom we represent in any such ill-considered scheme.

I believe, as I think most of you do, that the interests of the old people will best be served by maintaining and strengthening our present system of genuine two-way cooperation as between the States and the Federal Government. The Federal Government has an obligation for old-age assistance, but so have the States. No plan which would permit either to slip out from under its just responsibilities can long endure. Within the week we have closed the door and, I hope, locked it forever to the threat of an unsound Federal old-age pension plan. Let us not permit this equally dangerous proposal to get by us because it makes a back-alley approach in the guise of a simple amendment to the existing program.

To forestall this inequitable, this foolhardy measure, we need no uncommon insight or courage. Plain common sense, simple arithmetic, and an ordinary feeling for human justice and human rights—that is all it takes to reveal the weaknesses and the fallacies of these proposals. By taking a little thought now we shall save the American people, including the elder citizens for whom each of us feels a deep personal concern, from bitter disappointment and incalculable costs.

The Washington Post correctly appraises the situation in the following language:

THROUGH THE BACK DOOR

Senator Byrnes has further shaken the confidence of those who hoped that the decisive House vote last week could be regarded as the end of the Townsendism. If the Senator's plan to break down the present relationship between Federal and State contributions for old-age pensions should be adopted, it would give the Townsendites precisely the sort of opening wedge they are seeking.

At present the Social Security Board matches old-age allowances by the States on a 50-50 basis. Thus the system retains a very definite local character. States are not likely to promise extravagant benefits so long as their taxpayers are required to meet half of the bill. Senator Byrnes proposes, however, that the Federal Government increase its contribution to two-thirds of the total pension allowed in the poorer States.

Accordance of that principle for some States would as Acceptance of that principle for some States would, of course, quickly lead to demands for its general application. The next step might easily be a wholly Federal system of old-age pensions, in order to equalize the differences of which Senator Byrness complains. The Townsendites would then have only to bring about liberalization of Federal old-age benefits to arrive, by a delayed approach, at the goal they seek.

approach, at the goal they seek.

Senator Byrnes makes a good point against the Ways and Means Committee proposal to raise the maximum Federal contribution for the aged to $20 per month. That plan, he says, will benefit only the wealthier States able to match such payments dollar for dollar. States which can afford to contribute only $4 per capita for their indigent aged would continue paying $8 pensions. The gap between $8 and $40 pensions must be avoided. But the existence of this problem does not justify breaking down the safeguards against an extravagant all-Federal pensions system.

When the House begins debate on the proposed amendments to the Social Security Act today it must be alive to the very real danger of ushering in Townsendism through the back door.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman observed, in answer to a question by the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], that if this amendment were adopted the States would be inclined to ask for greater Federal contribution in every other activity, including road funds. Does the gentleman know of any State which has proposed that the Federal Government contribute more than 50 percent of road construction?

Mr. DISNEY. I do not; but I never heard before that they had proposed that we raise the 50-50 principle on anything

Mr. MOTT. On the other hand, the gentleman knows that the legislatures of a number of States have passed resolutions memorializing the Congress to pass legislation in line with the Townsend proposal, whereunder the Government furnishes the entire amount. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. DISNEY. If the legislatures had the responsibility of raising the money, they would not be doing such things. That is what I am contending—that they assume their responsibility.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman knows that is true.

Mr. DISNEY. I have noticed that.

Mr. MOTT. In other words, the tendency of legislatures today is to ask the Federal Government to furnish a flat old-age pension. There is no desire for any matching.

old-age pension. There is no desire for any matching.

Mr. DISNEY. They demand what they want. In other words, we are supposed under such a doctrine to legislate not on what we can afford, but on what they demand of us.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Following the long consideration which the Ways and Means Committee gave this subject and after so many weeks of testimony I assume the committee took into consideration the ability of the States to meet this problem. Did the Ways and Means Committee take any action on the question of embracing greater burden on the Federal Government than on the States? In other words, was the amendment which is now proposed considered by the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. DISNEY. Oh, yes; we considered it in the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. With what result?

Mr. DISNEY. That the proposal to raise to two-thirds was rejected after the most thorough and serious consideration. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLean].

Mr. McLean. Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to one of the most thoughtful and one of the most statesmanlike discussions that it has ever been my privilege to hear since I have been a Member of the House of Representatives, and it would be well for all of us to give some thought as to really what this contribution from the Federal Government to the States means. My attitude on the bill today might be described as that of one who came to scoff but stayed to pray. When the Social Security Act was previously before the House I was not in favor of it. I will vote for the pending measure. On the former occasion it was my conviction that the proposed activity was one in which the Federal Government should not inject itself. My school of thought was the same school as that of the President of the United States when he was Governor of New York.

On March 2, 1930, President Roosevelt, then Governor of New York, had this to say about the intervention of the Federal Government:

As a matter of fact and law, the governing rights of the States are all of those which have not been surrendered to the National Government by the Constitution or its amendments. Wisely or unwisely, people know that under the eighteenth amendment Congress has been given the right to legislate on this particular subject, but this is not the case in the matter of a great number of other vital problems of government, such as the conduct of public utilities, of banks, of insurance, of business, or agriculture, of education, of social welfare, and of a dozen other important features. In these Washington must not be encouraged to interfere.

The preservation of this home rule by the States is not a cry of jealous Commonwealths seeking their own aggrandizement at the expense of sister States. It is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country.

I share the same opinion today as that of President Roosevelt in 1930, but my position is altered by the fact that the social-security program is established, and my obligation is to assist in improving it. The modifications made by the pending bill are in that direction.

We are now engaged in a controversy as to the amount which shall be contributed by the Federal Government to the States to carry into effect the provisions of the bill.

This controversy illustrates the evils that are bound to grow out of the tendency of the present times to centralize all of our affairs in the Federal Government. The inadequate revenue systems of many States have made it difficult for them to finance numerous activities of present-day demands and, as the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Disney] pointed out, the power of the Federal Government under the sixteenth amendment to tax without limitation or control has created a demand on the part of these less fortunate States that the Federal Government assist in various enterprises alleged to be for the benefit of the Nation as a whole and there has developed the practice of granting subsidies to the States.

These subsidies are politically and affectionately designated as "grants in aid." In the making of these grants constitutional restraints are disregarded and their purposes lost sight of, and there is deliberate resort to unique and subtle devices to circumvent them. The suggestions for Federal aid uniformly come from States less fortunate, hoping to benefit through the medium of Federal taxation out of the resources of others.

The obvious political significance of these Federal grants weakens the resistance of those in control of the pursestrings. The political mind, in its desire for perpetuation in office, is ever ready to yield to those influences which will provide for constituency benefits which otherwise might not be enjoyed by those possessing the voting power. By accepting these subsidies the States must conform to requirements laid down in the Federal statutes. By so doing they admit a degree of supervision and control which threatens State independence, which will ultimately destroy the sovereignty of the States and render them mere administrative agencies of the Federal Government.

The theory upon which these so-called grants-in-aid are made is that the Federal Government has some reservoir of money disconnected with local taxation which can be tapped for the benefit of the States and their various subdivisions without affecting the local tax burden. Some day when the people begin to realize that concentration in the Federal Government has removed their Government from their direct control, when all governmental activities are directed by one individual or group, just what is happening will be better understood. After all, every citizen of the United States makes his contribution to the revenues of the Federal Government, as well as to the State and local governments, and you do not ease the tax burden by changing the medium through which the taxes are collected and spent.

The people of my own State of New Jersey, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, contributed over $210,000,000 in taxes to the Federal Government. These taxes were paid by the same people who paid taxes for the maintenance of the State and local governments. During that same year New Jersey received from the Federal Government for various relief purposes a little over $73,000,000, about 33½ percent of its contribution. Therefore, if a citizen of New Jersey paid to the Federal Government an income tax of $600, only about $200 was returned to the State in Federal grants, the balance being spent in localities far removed from the State and for purposes about which the New Jersey taxpayer had little or nothing to say.

The machinery of the Social Security Act is only one of many unique devices which have been resorted to for the purpose of circumventing the restraints of the Constitution. These restraints were created to preserve our liberty and independence by keeping governmental activities under direct popular control. It reflects no credit on the American people or the American system to say that the States cannot or will not meet their obligations to the needy through their local governments. It has been done. I challenge any Member of this House to admit that his State has neglected its obligations to the underprivileged. New Jersey, for example, was a pioneer in social legislation. We pride ourselves on our Workmen's Compensation Act, our public education system, our care of the blind, the widows, the orphans and aged persons, and mental defectives, and our program of vocational education and rehabilitation.

I said that New Jersey's contribution to the Federal Government was two-thirds more than it received. What is true of New Jersey is true elsewhere.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McLean. Mr. Chairman, in many States the amount of Federal money received far exceeds the amount contributed by them. How long will the States permit the use of this device of taking money from the Federal Government and using it as an agency to take money out of the pockets of the more fortunate States, "sucker States," if you please, in the parlance of the day. We are heading to a time when the States will lose their identity and become mere administrative agencies of the Federal Government. The practice does violence to the statement of President Roosevelt in 1930 that "preservation of home rule is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country."

Mr. Chairman, my attitude toward this program, as I have stated, remains the same, but my position is altered so far as this bill is concerned. I expect to vote for the measure. While I do not believe in the principle of the Federal Government carrying on this activity, we face a condition. The Congress has determined that it is a proper governmental function for the Federal Government to stick its nose into the activities of the States; and on the theory that this is a better bill, that this bill will better protect what rights may be left to the States, I am constrained to support it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to compliment the committee for the amendments here recommended, which will leave approximately $1,575,000,000 over a period of the next 3 years in the hands of industry and the workers. This saving may be used in the purchase of consumer goods or it may be placed in the field of investment, and the savings are made to the people because the committee's recommendations do not permit the increased rates to go into effect until January 1, 1940, in connection with the changes they have made in the pay-roll and the unemployment-insurance tax.

The committee gives encouragement also because it seems to point out to us that the Congress can push a social-security program beyond the limits of the present technology to support. If we go too far in this respect, we contribute to the pulling down of the whole structure of social security and the boasted high standard of living which we enjoy today as a people.

For the committee to be able to come to us in the form of these amendments, and as they now recommend that we act. which amendments are you might say only slight changes in the original Social Security Act, and they are only temporary in that they run for a period of only 3 years, and at the same time prevent the assessment or save for our people one and a half billion dollars, should prove to us that we were exceedingly loose in the construction and approval of the original Social Security Act.

Mr. Chairman, these recommended changes not only leave the framework of the Social Security Act intact but, in my opinion, these changes now supported by the committee actually strengthen the act and make it more acceptable to all and more nearly bearable to those who have to put up the money. Accordingly, in my opinion, we move in a direction of preserving the original philosophy of the Social Security Act.

Mr. Chairman, scientific knowledge is cumulative. It moves forward by steps. We can make too many promises. We can create too many dollar obligations for our scientific machinery to meet at a given time. Moving out of the field of poetry into the realm of grim reality, we know we cannot pour out of a pint measure more than a pint.

Mr. Chairman, I believe every man or woman who toils should have in this day, in this age, in this country, a frugal living, one economic in the use or expenditure of resources, not wasteful or lavish, saving, sparing, and with it all obtained by or appropriate to economy. So in considering this social-security problem I keep in mind the man or woman who has worked, who is now working, and who must hereafter work. For each there should be a frugal living. We can apply the tax too severely. We can be too aggressive.

Dr. Berle, in dealing somewhat with this situation, made this statement just the other day before the Temporary National Economic Committee:

We have the undisputed fact in the United States—it appears partly true also in France, and to a less extent in Great Britain that the private capital markets have been in large measure closed since the year 1931.

The flow into capital construction may be said to have found The flow into capital construction may be said to have found its norm at a level of somewhere between eight and ten billions of dollars during the decade from 1920 to 1930. Of this, at least six billions went through the public markets—that is, occurred by sale of stocks and bonds. The balance went into construction through the mortgage markets or through private placement. By 1931 the amounts going through the public markets had fallen to approximately half that amount, then withered to a mere fraction. At a maximum, since 1931, not more than two and one-half billions of true capital money has gone through the mechanism of the public markets. The average is considerably less.

The conclusion is obvious: American private markets are not

The conclusion is obvious: American private markets are not funneling capital funds into capital construction at more than—roughly—one-third to one-half the rate they were doing in the 1920-30 decade. This means that private activity in heavy industry is not being continuously generated in sufficient volume to keep those industries busy, or to keep the country continuously on keep those industries busy, or to keep the country continuously on an even economic keel.

The slack has been taken up by Government financing.

There is, first, the fact that the wealth-creating power of the Government is relatively limited. It has under its direct control not more than, perhaps, one-tenth of the productive machinery of the country. This is largely traditional in form.

If, therefore, wealth is to be created by creation of Government debt, the scope of Government enterprise must be largely increased. Briefly, the Government will have to enter into the direct financing of activities now supposed to be private; and a continuance of that direct financing must be inevitably that the Government ultimately will control and own those activities. Put differently, if the Government undertakes to create wealth by using its own credit at the rate of four billion or so a year, and if its work is well done, the Government will be acquiring direct productive mechanisms at the rate of four billions' worth a year, or thereabouts. Over a period of years, the Government will gradually come to own most of the productive plants of the United States.

This is certainly so fundamentally a change in the course of

This is certainly so fundamentally a change in the course of American life that the decision to make it should be taken reasons other than relief of a series of temporary difficulties. the country desires to make wealth creation a function of Gov-ernment (I personally believe it must do so in larger measure than it has heretofore) the choice should be the considered choice of the country, and not the result of a policy of drift.

So, Mr. Chairman, from the statements of Dr. Berle we can gather additional evidence of what is taking place in this country, of why we have so many unemployed, of why our people are so conscious of this thing we call social security. Congress responds, more or less, to the demands of the people. Congress is conscious of pressure groups. Congress feels perhaps more keenly the call of the pressure groups than it understands the stress it places, from time to time, on the ability of our people to contribute to the tax box whether it be in the form of social-security taxes-or savings some would prefer to call them-or for some other purpose or objective. I personally feel that we are more apt to place too great a load on the people, that we are more likely to impose a social cost that is beyond the ability of our people to bear, than we are to overlook the social needs of the people.

With the permission of the House, I wish to further explore some of these factors and elements which enter into the general picture and which contribute so greatly to the growing concern of our people. Without question, the great number of unemployed—now estimated to be around 11,000,000 workers—is directly related to the absence of capital credit to which Dr. Berle refers. Furthermore, the factor of hoarding, the practice of pump priming, and the creation of credit money by Government are elements which we should consider in dealing with the program of the Social Security Act and these amendments here under consider-

BANK HOARDING-PRICES

Mr. Chairman, an expression of appreciation is due the gentleman from California [Mr. Voorhis] for his friendly recognition on May 8 of my effort of the 4th of May to present a partial analysis of farm price relations and money supply.

HOARDING VERSUS PUMP PRIMING

I beg to protest, however, that certain inferences which he drew from my remarks do not seem to me to be warranted. For example, I hope we may not fail at this point in the discussion to recognize the clarifying contribution of the Federal Reserve Board's recent statements pointing out that a record high in money supply is today accompanied by a low in price level. While it is not true, as the Board at least implied—the inference was actually drawn by the Economists' National Committee on Monetary Policy in reprinting the March statement of the Board-that price relations to which the Board itself attributes important economic significance have not moved with money supply, it is quite obvious that factors affecting the use of the money supply have intervened under the policies which have developed since the economic collapse of 1929-30.

It is gratifying, indeed, to have the gentleman from California acknowledge that these policies, because of the way in which they have created and floated new money to offset the losses of deflation, are proving, to use his words, to be "inadequate to solve the problem." Since these policies have had the support of both parties, I am happy to join him in pointing out that as to results we did not "plan it that way." Confession is good for the soul; and we may even hope that the shouting and tumult will die and the captains and kings of politics depart, leaving us to sacrifice our partisan pride of opinion and face these unsolved problems with an humble and a contrite heart.

I do not feel that in the time available I can resolve all of what seem to me the confusions in analysis and definition of terms which the gentleman has drawn from current political and academic thought and incoroprated in his reply. But I must at least point out that these ideas introduce considerations that, in my opinion, are quite extraneous to the problem of the monetary cycle with which we are dealing.

MONOPOLY PRICES

Outstanding among these irrelevancies is the specious attempt to create an alibi for our fiscal incompetency by attributing sticky or rigid prices to what the gentleman calls the magic of monopoly. To begin with, competent students, such as Humphrey, Tucker, and quite recently Arthur, have presented ample arguments to show that there is no magic about it; for as related especially to the size of modern units of industrial production, monopoly can have no determining relation to the general rigidity of prices in durable goods. On the whole, such prices fail to rise as much as they fail to fall, and they developed this lag relative to shifts in farm prices long before the day of the supercorporation. But even if this were not true, the gentleman has eagerly admitted that we are dealing with a monetary problem in which the difficulty lies not in price rigidity but in price variability, which should not have occurred were monetary supply properly controlled.

His argument, therefore, reminds us of the good Irish biddy watching the holiday parade. As her son Pat's platoon swung around the prosperity corner she noted well the rigid and orderly array. But her maternal pride swayed her partisan viewpoint as she saw Pat striding out in front of the line. "B'gorra, 'n look, wud ye!" she cried. "They're all out o' step ixcipt Paat!"

Price rigidity—the gentleman would call it stability if he were not baiting big business—is the very thing he is seeking. Indeed, he is only too eager to suggest that it is the lack of stable prices that causes the hoarding of money such as we are now witnessing. In this contention we all readily concur. But this, as I shall undertake to show, is for the very reason that it sets up a vicious circle of cause and effect which eclipses the influence of a normal rate of interest in maintaining that circulation of money which can alone assure us that hoarding will not develop and create the very panics, followed by booms as rising prices recur, which we are seeking to cure.

BANKING, HOARDING, INVESTMENT, PRICES

Let the gentleman note well that the money changers were in the temple long before the evils of the modern clearing-house system were developed by banking with partial reserves. Let us recognize, too, that hoarding, under modern developments in the field of capital formation, that is, under mechanization, is capable of causing quite as much if not more difficulty in price cycles than is caused with the existing banking system. This system, though a very cause of instability—and Mr. Voorhis has such an eminent authority as Professor Slichter, of Harvard, to support him in this position—does at least allow for some erratic expansion, even by public as by private borrowing, as the gentleman well notes.

Hoarding, therefore, remains the ancient and fundamental evil with which we must deal; and in this connection I submit that it seems relatively immaterial whether or not we grant an unjust concession to people of means to create money in the form of bank credit. In the long run the effect of hoarding in producing the difficulty of money-price cycles must be pretty much the same as that of banking with partial reserves. The modern money problem is, indeed, more critical, but not so much because of the banking system as because of our mechanical development of capital equipment. The accompanying complex divisions in productive processes make continuity in trading through money imperative for the maintenance of economic stability and employment.

Indeed, it is at this point that I beg to take sharp issue with the bargain basement theory of pump priming by subsidizing consumers to maintain stable prices, to keep consumer purchasing power up to production, in the President's words. We are all consumers, especially of the food supplies which so sensitively record monetary conditions in their farm price level. Rich or poor, our consumption level in necessities is the same and has the same relation to the price of staples. But we are not all savers who can hoard money, and it is precisely for that reason that the method of issuing money must consider, not the spending motives of the have-nots who are without reserves which they can choose not to spend, but the spending motives of those who have earned a surplus in income which they can hoard. What will they do, and why? Should not those who earn and save our surplus control its investment? Is this not in the public interest?

How, indeed, can our eminently sincere Golden State colleague, having traced the cause of hoarding to falling prices, fail to see that he is not dealing with hoarding at all when he proposes to subsidize necessitous spending as against the investment of savings or surplus funds? Let us get hold of the fact that we cannot pin this lack of so-called velocity in money supply solely on the banks or on a few wealthy Midases, but must attribute it to everyone's cash balances insofar as such balances do not have to be spent for necessities. The failure of investment in paring knives or automobiles has the same effect, in proportion to its value volume, as the failure to invest in hotels or steel mills. As the socalled lack of confidence affects the money supply and the business cycle through the operation of bank credit, so it must also affect the sum of money in use through affecting the rate of employment of cash, just as it would do were we operating under an exclusively cash system. Failure to expand the money supply in such a way as to prevent falling farm prices must have this hoarding effect regardless of the banking system, even though it be true that our system of extending credit through the banks operates to prevent that essential monetary control.

It seems to me essential, therefore, that the monetary methods adopted shall affect not those incomes which must necessarily be spent regularly but rather those incomes or really that part of all incomes which can at will be spent irregularly and become indefinitely unspent as cash balances, thus affecting the total sum of money being used in trade. Is it not plain, both in theory and in fact, that this sum—all the money actually being spent—does not affect the price level of the classes of goods which, being durable, need not be bought as used and from which spending may therefore be withheld, but rather the prices of those goods which are used up as purchased and for which money must be spent continuously? Prices exist, and are related to the sum of money spent, in sales which are consummated, not in sales which are withheld.

As a business community the country seems not to budget its spending as an individual account might do, so as to allot a particular segment of its income to food supply. If staple farm prices are falling, income is not thereby released to other, nonnecessitous spending. On the contrary, income is, as a whole, devoted proportionately less to other thingsso much less, indeed, that in order to sustain industrial sales the decrease in so-called demand would have to be apportioned, simultaneously, amongst the complex chain of productive factors which operate in assembling the products of industry. Doing this, simultaneously, is plainly impossible. So the final process of the many steps involved in the total cost of assembling any industrial product would have to assimilate the whole of this deflationary loss if all finished, consumer goods are to decline in price as flexibly as raw materials. Plainly, this, too, cannot be done if the final processor is to remain solvent, for he has already paid for antecedent costs (raw materials and unfinished goods) at a higher level of prices.

The result of deflation is, then, that the normal margin of profit which sustains all industry and investment, and which is the normal rate of interest, is destroyed and durable goods tend to be sold, to sustain their market position, at a price level representing money costs which must be restored by reflation to make the system work at all. Imagine, if you can, the chaos of a market for durable goods which operated flexibly to meet the monetary instability of farm prices! What would happen to the used-car market, for example, if new automobiles came onto the market at prices which varied with crop prices? Indeed, in such a market, the housewife would find herself renting washing machines and, mayhap, even paring knives, from a holding company operated to speculate or hedge against these allegedly competitive flexibilities in price.

It is obviously, then, impossible to keep the price of capital equipment, accumulated at costs incurred over a period of changing prices, in line with variable farm prices. If the normal rate of interest—the normal, marginal rate of return on investment—is affected by mere changes in the price of inventories (of all kinds of property), money incomes rise and fall accordingly and the whole capital structure is progressively affected in its price at a multiple rate based upon calculations from the normal rate of discount or interest, if that rate is allowed to operate without interference. For this reason, money, despite attempts to neutralize the difficulty by changes in bank rates, is sooner or later sucked into speculative operations in capital values, largely through speculation in real estate and mechanics of the stock market. This affects normal business much as does hoarding, so that the money supply is never adequate and cannot be made adequate in the face of a rising level of basic commodity prices.

NEW CREDIT SCHEMES SUBVERSIVE

Despite this inherent monetary impasse involved in rising prices. Marxian fallacies as to the nature of capital and interest and their relation to monetary saving and investment have so permeated the whole of our body politic including, it would seem, even the Golden State, as to lead to the gentleman's naive proposal for a rising price level as a remedy for our troubles with debt! Our minds have become so chronically confused by inurement to the existing money muddle that we find it very difficult to think at all, it seems, in terms of a rational system. Indeed, though the gentleman has agreed with Dr. Currie that our money supply must come into existence free from debt, does he not now propose a system of public meddling with what must and should remain the properly private function of loaning money, by opening a ledger of national credit which so far has never been opened? How, pray, can public credit be loaned into a free system of competitive private enterprise? Is not the proposal for a system of industrial finance banks under Government auspices, selling consolidated debentures and stock to the public, but making credit and even equity capital available to producers, just another name for the very same kind of a financial Tower of Babel which we have been trying to build in the Federal Reserve System? Is it not, in reality, just such a system of concessions in credit money that we are now struggling to force into operation and which is proving not to be the answer even though autocracy be invoked, as in Germany, in the vain attempt to make it work?

In the words of the venerable president of the University of Minnesota, Dr. Guy Stanton Ford, prefacing the most notable volume of essays on dictatorships yet to appear in print.

The unconscious fascism of many of the prescriptions to preserve democracy should give the thoughtful citizen more anxiety than the vague danger of a handful of radicals.

If my efforts to be thoughtful about the pickle being prepared for democracy in this Congress have told me anything. it is that those experts who are ideologizing for our milliondollar tem-permanent econostrums committee are preparing statistical opiates to assure public unconsciousness while democracy is being preserved in the saltpeter of bureaucracy and the vinegar of autocracy. Even Dr. Currie has, by request-I wonder who requested it-presented the committee with an array of dope sheets which should, let me say, raise the ghost of Disraeli in his trenchant retort: "There are three kinds of lies: White lies, damned lies, and statistics." Dr. Simon Kuznets, of the National Bureau of Economic Research, upon whose work I observe the Currie showing on offsets for saving is largely based, has himself indicated that these statistics of national income and capital formation are at best not precise guides in business-cycle studies. Yet it is assuredly the business cycle with which this committee should be especially concerned.

While it seems to be an accepted precept of statistical methods that figures prove nothing as to economic causation, their soporific influence has apparently beclouded even such an outstanding intellect as that which told this very economic committee only last summer:

Regulation is always dangerous. Finally there is always the certainty that * * * the regulations will be used for purposes which are either corrupt, political, or doctrinaire. Any of these three may produce violent and extremely unhealthy results.

I wish someone would explain the system of capital credit which the author of this sage advice, Dr. Adolf Berle, Jr., now proposes in conjunction with the gentleman from California, so as to make me understand how it can be operated without regulations. An allegedly new banking system carried on not for profit but as a public service charged with the responsibility of making capital-credit loans to business and to government is projected—without regulation?

Let us beware, Mr. Chairman. Beware the Greeks when

Let us beware, Mr. Chairman. Beware the Greeks when bearings gifts. Beware the starry-eyed liberal when devising new deals to operate on altruism. Give me liberty to profit or lose competitively in investment if you want me to feel safe from exploitation.

Whether or not so-called interest charges be attached to such a credit system as now exists or as these gentlemen of the New Deal are adumbrating for us is wholly immaterial to its feasibility. The flaw in the system lies in the attempt to float new money by lending it, so that the money exists in the debt structure only and can no longer exist for use if and when the debt is paid. Putting politics into such a scheme of parasitic, forced saving through Government auspices cannot sanctify it. On the contrary, that is precisely what has put the Federal Reserve Board on the spot today. Political pressure will continue to make a racket out of the very best intentions in the management of money by any board empowered to use its discretion in any way whatsoever. This will be true even in that fool's paradise where, according to Dr. Berle, new centers of finance are to be more responsible to the public by being wholly under nonpolitical, public control. But regulations, mind you, the doctor's own words, "regulations are to free them"-not the people but these new, new deals in finance-from the rigidities which now obstruct the flow of capital. No one suggests change in the objectives of the New Deal's struggles. But Heaven protect us from these unscrupulous money changers who, faced by the failure of credit, have proposed only the lending of more money, for though condemned in these very words in President's Roosevelt's first inaugural address, money lending and more money lending is still the fiscal principle under which those objectives are being sought after 6 long years of lip service to monetary liberalism. Liberalism; yes—with other peoples' money.

BUSINESS CYCLES ARE MONETARY

Bad as its sponsorship of spending has been, however, the present Reserve Board has at least been superwise in its suggestion that it be not given any added illusory powers. No matter what the auspices, the attempt to spend, privately or publicly, through an uncontrollable lending system, cannot operate otherwise than in business cycles of inflation and deflation. Failing to mend the roof in fair weather under the illusion that it is unnecessary, we are deluged with money leaks when the rainy day recurs. Quoting the words of Dr. F. H. Knight, of Chicago University, in closing a caustic criticism of the latest treatise on money and interest by John Maynard Keynes, our British bellwether in lending and spending, let me suggest that since speculative psychology tends to give rise to a kind of momentum or cumulative tendency in price changes, and since this tendency should be especially strong in the case of money, the essential function of which is to be held speculatively, therefore this-monetary speculation-is the most important factor in the general tendency to oscillate in an economic system—in contrast with speculative cycles affecting particular commodities.

Professor Marshall, of England, fully recognized—page 594 of his Principles—this monetary character of the business cycle and pointed out, in the precepts of his preface, that those effects of an economic cause which are not easily traced, are frequently more important than, and in the opposite direction to, those which lie on the surface and attract the eye of the casual observer. As recently pointed out by Dr. Timoshenko in a paper from Leland Stanford University dealing with the post-war price of wheat, monetary influences are a powerful price factor which nevertheless do not lie on the surface where they can be isolated and studied statistically.

We have then to deal with a factor the influence of which cannot be presented statistically in the investigations conducted by a congressional committee, however highly financed. What is needed, it seems to me, is not an addendum to the plethora of so-called facts already accumulated, but a correct interpretation of facts well known to everyone. It is not things as they are or have been, statistically, but things as they ought to be, that need a thorough reconsideration.

Does anyone deny that an outright policy of inflation would produce forthwith what is commonly called recovery? Hardly. We know very well that we cannot attain recovery and reemployment without an accompaniment of monetary inflation. What is not yet solved is the problem of making it permanent—of controlling, without restricting freedom of enterprise, the advance of prices to prevent the disparities of inflation, while maintaining an adequate supply of money in use to prevent the disparities of deflation. Nor can we meet this problem of prices and monetary inflation by playing ostrich with it—by sticking our heads in the sands of a Kentucky hillside where all that gold no longer glitters!

The eminent gentleman from New York [Mr. Barton] has recently suggested the one sure way to stage a prompt recovery while calling a halt on public spending, to wit:

Cut taxes immediately. Instead of decreasing the deficit the first year, this might for the moment increase it.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. Barton] has failed, it seems to me, to consider sufficiently the dangerous situation which deficit pump-priming has already produced under deficits borrowed from the banking system. Smothering taxation, accompanied by extravagant subsidies of all kinds, has produced the condition fostered by subsidized interest rates that has been disclosed by the chart of farm prices, money supply, and income, which I presented before this House on May 4. Unless we systematize Mr. Barton's procedure for tax relief to make it check, as well as cause, inflation, changing also to a system of demand deposits covered by full reserves to prevent credit inflation, we can have only a gambler's recovery of runaway prices—and such a recovery, it would seem, probably cannot be stalled off much longer. Without this divorce between money supply and bank loans, as proposed by Dr. Currie, we face assured instability from the perverse elasticity of the system. This was pointed out also by Professor Slichter, of the Harvard School of Business, in his book Toward Stability. That instability, that uncontrolled inflation, may bring recovery, but with it will surely come the attempt to dictate prices and control investment that spells fascism. Thus arises the subtle subversion of democracy and free enterprise foreseen by Dr. Goldenweiser, of the Federal Reserve Board's staff, early in the New Deal, when he thus expressed himself:

I am firmly convinced that monetary control does not exist and that within the framework of our economic and political organization monetary control can never exist. It will not exist until such time * * * when the Government will control substantially all economic activity.

This, then, is the defeatist view which the economic committee of this Congress and the administration is obviously taking for granted. Almost every presentation which official witnesses have put before this temporary (?) committee has been a promotion, not of a broad, open-minded investigation, but of a gilded goose-step into un-American activities.

CAPITAL IS NOT MONEY

Fundamentally, may I insist, the mistaken idea that interest is actually a charge for the use of money is at the bottom of the confusion of thought in which we have become enmeshed. In this confusion experts and laymen alike are failing to distinguish between money and wealth. Let us try to get this clear. Except, perhaps, in the form of public debt which, as Thomas Jefferson insisted, should be constitutionally prohibited, it is obvious that money itself cannot be invested.

It can only be kept in circulation by being spent for that which is actually invested—that is, for the productive factors such as reachines, which are properly called capital. Whatever may be the practice in accounting—and my own business experience has been largely centered in accountancy—neither money nor instruments of indebtedness can be called economic capital. They may, of course, be properly listed in the balance sheet as individual or corporate business assets, but they are not themselves productive of any real wealth or income and therefore cannot be listed as capital in the sense of wealth—that is, as economic assets.

If we are to erase the confusion between money and wealth, between price and value, from our discussions, we must stop using the word "capital" to mean both or either—money and/or wealth. Capital is not money except to the individual who is counting his assets in toto as his capital, in which case he sums up everything in terms of money even though he be not actually possessed of a single cent of money. Capital in this sense of real wealth is not purchasing power as is money, and therefore is no proper, direct concern of Government, certainly not in its responsibility for dealing with our boom-bust monetary cycles.

Because money is not wealth, it may well be defined as that, the ownership of which excludes the ownership of wealth and prevents the holder from participating in the benefits of income. Normally, and properly, the holder of money cannot love money. Rather must he have to get rid of it—spend it for something which he can invest, that is, something which he can put to productive use, before he can enjoy any income. If properly used, money thus serves to socialize wealth in the sense of assuring that all wealth shall be produced for continual use.

Trading, indeed, is for mutual profit; it would not otherwise continue. It is, in other words, the procedure which creates the values in the products of division of labor which would otherwise be valueless to their producers. In brief, a normal money system must operate so that saving and investment may and normally do proceed coincidentally. This is accomplished because the production of surplus value by anyone can function at once through the medium of exchange to reward him with so-called unearned income. Through liquidating his surplus production-by conversion into money-and placing the money at interest at the disposal of society, the producer of wealth acquires income in liquid form without having wastefully to hold or invest his surplus goods himself. Indeed, if he neither spends nor lends his money, society proceeds to use the real wealth he previously produced without rewarding him at all. This, truly, is production for use in the socialistic ideal. use-no profit.

In the light of this distinction between money and wealth we can readily see that it is simply not true, as the gentleman from California [Mr. Voorhis] alleges, that the supply of money must be increased because, forsooth, Investment means a storing up * * of a portion of current income.

Investment spending, even for Government bonds, does not store or hide any money and therefore create a need for a replacement fund. Normally, though not always under our existing credit system, investment circulates money just like any other spending. Indeed, all spending is investment, if not in the capitalistic accessories to labor which function in production, then in man himself as a productive factor; for as the philosopher Kant observed, man is both cause and effect. In all investment, human beings are both the means to the objective and the objective itself.

TAX RELIEF AGAINST PUBLIC SPENDING

To summarize, the new money must be issued, not by doles at the bottom of the system, but by tax relief into the hands of those whose incomes are in part available as taxes to support unproductive public spending and therefore can and will be used in private, productive investment and employment when released by remission of taxes. As long as public policy is based on the theory that public spending instead of tax relief for private spending is the only available expedient, it is assuredly inevitable that the Nation will be progressively engaged either in a fatal drift to communistic futilities or in boondoggling instead of in profitable production and trade. Since neither of these is feasible, Government squandering to "prime the pump" is a policy which finds itself in a dilemma, caught between the devil of depression and the deep blue sea of autocracy and bureaucracy.

WHAT IS CAPITALISM?

Let me close by asking consideration for what seem to me underlying principles in the normal operation today, as always throughout human history, of the competitive, capitalistic system. Let me say that while I hold no brief from Dr. Knight, of Chicago, and do not wish to involve him in the shortcomings of this presentation, I take my cue from my own business experience as illuminated by ideas which he has offered, particularly in criticism of Irving Fisher's presentation of the orthodox theory of interest and value.

A human economy can only operate capitalistically. Human economic values always represent estimates of future annual income accruing from the productivity of the asset being appraised, which is then capitalized at a fixed, natural rate of interest to set the valuation. Capital, in other words-real wealth, not money-must maintain a net reproductive rate in excess of all amortization charges-including insurance against risk-of approximately 5 percent annually in order to be worth what it cost. Investments, which in a money system should correspond with prices, are always appraised for pricing, not by whether or not the accumulation of costs which they normally represent proves capable of reproduction at a net rate to cover all expenses but by whether or not that net rate annually equals about 5 percent of those antecedent costs which have built up a given investment.

This dynamic process of maximizing productivity, income, estimating it numerically, capitalizing the resulting values at a multiple of 20 times the annual income, and adjusting antecedent costs to this appraisal, is obviously one which is so complex that it can be validated only by the personal responsibility of ownership for the solvency of the results attained. A free market choice should exist, free from price fixing by government; but it cannot be free from the stern realities of our existence and our environment as they fix the consequences of behavior. The profit and loss in property values resulting from reduction or elevation of expenses or productivity is a fixed multiple of resulting annual income. That is to say, any property is ultimately altered in value about 20 times as much as its annual net income is altered. This is true whether trading occurs or not.

It is thus obvious that errors in estimating incomes and resulting values may develop not only from individual lack of technical skill or knowledge but also from a social failure to use either a constant rate of interest or a common denominator of constant economic value in recording items of expense and production. Such a denominator and rate of interest cannot be selected arbitrarily for use but must be real, economic constants actually involved in the cumulative cost of all production as it is molded into property which can be owned and appraised. Obviously, a change in the numerical-monetary-expression of this real unit of cost or economic value, or a change in the interest ratio at which capital values are computed, will theoretically create a change in numerical-monetary-inventory that is proportionate to the investment already attained in processing at the time of change in the monetary denominator or in the rate of interest. Highly processed, durable commodities, which do not have to be used up as fast as purchased, will, therefore, become involved in capitalistic, speculative trading, resulting from interest-rate and monetary changes, at prices which vary intricately in proportion to their durability and length of processing.

Thus the fixed, natural rate of interest is the fulcrum upon which all trading values including natural resources are balanced against their productive capacity per annum. The process of appraisal on this basis is and always has been continuous and dynamic, for we are always debiting the investment with the rate of interest and crediting it with the value of services obtained during the intervals of use. If this account fails to balance, the investment is recapitalized accordingly by all those who trade for pricing on the market.

Investment thus never yields any continuous profit or loss above or below the rate of interest. It is always reappraised, not on the basis of whether or not it produces a net income—above or below zero—but on the basis of the net income as related to the rate of interest—above or below about 5 percent per annum.

When the Greeks used a word meaning "offspring" for what the Romans came to call "inter-est," they had not fallen so completely under the spell of the money illusion but that they recognized that trading invariably proceeds on this fundamental, reproductive precept in capitalization. Every attempt in history to alter it by lending of new money at depressed rates or at no interest, has resulted in more or less disastrous hoarding and subsequent uncontrollable inflation. It has resulted, in other words, in a "business cycle." In my opinion, that is the way all this Government meddling with the lending of money will work out this time; and it is against this very contingency that the Federal Reserve Board has now warned the Congress that it does not have and cannot be given, effective powers of control.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

I fear I would accuse the gentleman from California of a deliberate partisan attempt to obscure or camouflage the issues by sophistries did I not know, not only of his personal sincerity and integrity, but also how serious the confusion of thought, and of language, has become in the field of cycle and monetary theory as related to prices. As evidence of the nature of this confusion, Mr. Chairman, I shall very shortly beg leave to extend my remarks to include in the Record a series of letters which passed between myself and the Bureau of Agricultural Economics during the past year, leading up to the development of the chart of grain prices which I exhibited to this House on May 4. I asked the gentleman from California to join me at that time in requesting an excess of space, if found necessary, in which this correspondence may be printed.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on this subject and include some additional comments I wish to make that have to do with this problem.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Committee on Ways and Means for the fine work it has done on social-security legislation since the beginning of 1935. This bill proposes a substantial amendment to the old-age assistance part of that law. It proposes that the Federal Government match up to $40, 50-50, the amount paid by the States; in other words, the Federal Government promises to pay as a direct Federal contribution $20 to each eligible person on the pension roll over 65 years of age. A $20 contribution; let us keep that in mind.

UNOFFICIAL STEERING COMMITTEE

This morning there was held a meeting in the caucus room, attended by Members of the House who are interested in liberalizing the old-age assistance part of this law. It was called by the gentleman from Mississippi, Congressman Colmer, who was elected chairman of the group. Many of us would like to see the Federal Government make a direct contribution of $30. Many would like to have different plans and proposals adopted. So we have agreed to pool all our different proposals before this unofficial steering committee and endeavor to get one major liberalizing amendment adopted to this part of the law. The amendment that was agreed upon is an amendment by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer], and it will be offered by him when this bill is read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO CONTRIBUTE 4 TO 1 UP TO LIMIT OF $20 CONTRIBUTION BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

This amendment provides, briefly, that the Federal Government will contribute $4 for every $1 that is put up by a State up to $20, the maximum amount that the Federal Government will be out. Remember, the committee offers a $20 maximum now in this bill, so this Colmer amendment will not increase that. Take a State that is putting up $10 now, under existing law the old-age pension recipients are receiving $20, half from the State and half from the Federal Government.

Under the Colmer amendment $5 of that amount will be sufficient to obtain $20 from the Government. That will make $25. Then the $5 extra which the State is paying will make $30. In other words, for every $10 that is put up by the State, up to $20, the Federal contribution limit, the State recipients will obtain $30—$10 put up by the State and $20 put up by the Federal Government. If all the States take advantage of the provision offered them in this committee bill, which is to match 50-50 up to $40 per month, the Federal Government will be out just as much as it would be out under the Colmer amendment.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. PATMAN. In just a moment I will yield.

I know the contention will be made that all the States cannot take advantage of this committee proposal. Shall we place ourselves in the position where we are collecting money from people all over the Nation by a 1-cent Federal tax on each gallon of gasoline, almost a 100-percent sales tax on cigarettes, an excise tax, and a normal-income tax, all these taxes being paid by people all over the Nation, but when we commence to distribute the money out for old-age assistance. when we commence paying it out, we commence at the top and help only the wealthy States? Shall we go back and tell our old people, "We voted for a law which would give you $40 a month, with $20 Federal contribution, if you live in California or in New York, but if you live in Texas or Mississippi or Oklahoma or in some of these other States, some of the States in New England as well, we cannot give you that amount. We are giving it only to the people who live in the wealthy States."

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I am sorry I cannot yield. I do not have

I do not believe that is fair to the people who live in the poorer States and who pay exactly the same in proportion to what the people in all the States pay. It is certainly unfair to collect the money as we do and pay it out in that way.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.
Mr. BUCK. The States to which the gentleman refers match Federal funds for road improvement on a 50-50 basis, do they not?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. In 1937, according to the information I have, some of those States spent millions of dollars to match the Federal contribution.

Mr. PATMAN. That is right.

Mr. BUCK. While they spent only a few paltry thousands of dollars to take care of their aged.

Mr. PATMAN. That is not a comparable situation at all. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Colmer amendment is adopted when it is presented. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, the primary purpose I have in asking for this time is to ask a question of one of the members of the Ways and Means Committee, but first I want to say a word for a class of people that do not seem to come within the philosophy or the scope of this act, and they are the employers. Take, for instance, the small stores in small country towns where we find storekeepers and little places of business such as laundries and so forth that may go on for years and employ quite a few people. We find in many instances that after their rent is paid and their lights and heat are paid for and after the janitor is paid and after their other help is paid, they have little left for themselves.

They have been contributing to this fund from the beginning and yet, under the philosophy or scope of this bill, if they go broke, and the records show that from 75 to 90 percent of employers engaged in such small business today do go broke, we find them without the scope of this measure and without being able to receive any benefits from this social-security set-up and, personally, I would like to know from some member of the Ways and Means Committee, and particularly my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper], if there is any way by which we can amend this bill to include such an employer, for instance, who goes broke.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute and will be glad to endeavor to give him the best information I can in that brief time.

Of course, this program is to provide benefits for employees and not employers. Under the original report of the President's Committee on Economic Security, a provision was included and recommended to provide for voluntary annuities, which would have taken care of the type of person to which the gentleman refers. We encountered considerable opposition from insurance companies to that provision of the recommendation. Therefore in the original social-security bill that part was not included and it is still not included in the pending measure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Jenkins].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, it would seem from the discussions we have had that by far the majority of the House has already made up its mind what it is going to do, and it would seem that this bill will pass overwhelmingly. It is almost useless for us to indulge in any further debate. Really, we have had no real debate for there are not many items in controversy. We have had rather a symposium of explanations, and I do not know that we will have much further debate when we get into the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule. Some of you who were here 5 years ago, when we passed the social security bill, know that it was generally considered that that was the most comprehensive bill that had ever been passed since the foundation of the Republic. When I say comprehensive I mean the most all inclusive. Of course, a war measure or other measures of that kind constitute a different proposition, but it was generally considered then, and is considered now, that the social security bill is the most comprehensive, all-inclusive bill that Congress has ever passed from the days of George Washington down to 1935.

When we passed that bill it divided itself naturally into two categories, and that same situation obtains with reference to the bill we are considering today. Any arguments that we may have with reference to this bill will all divide on these two points.

What are the two divisions to which I refer? One is the division that has its source in the wellspring of public charity or from a public sense of duty to those of our people who, through no fault of their own, are unable to properly care for themselves.

The second division is title II and title III, which readily classify themselves into the classification that I shall call insurance.

In this first grant is old-age pensions. There is no special tax laid for this class. Do not get it confused with the oldage benefits. The old-age pension section in title I is a charitable proposition, where the United States Government comes forward and seeks to do something for the aged people of the country. Tomorrow, when someone rises and offers an amendment to change the program of 50-50 contributions, you must remember that the old-age pension plan that we passed 5 years ago did not originate with the Federal Government. The Federal Government is not the originator. Congress cannot claim patent rights on old-age pensions, because many of the States had old-age pension laws long before the Federal Government took it; but you can put your finger on this, that the Federal Government did not take it up until it found out how popular it was with the States, and it then took it up with the idea in mind that it should always be a national policy, and that the Government and the States should divide the responsibility. We laid the proposition down that the States should participate equally with the Federal Government. The Federal Government did not put up any machinery for distribution. It did not provide for that; it simply laid down the proposition that we would give an equal amount with any State up to $15. But the States must come forward and superintend the distribution of the pensions. The States must administer it. If we had not provided in that bill that the States would administer the act. it never would have been passed; and why? Because we argued that we wanted the administration of the law close to the people so that the people could tell who were the chiselers and who were the people that should not have the pension and who were the ones who should have it. And so when we considered that proposition 4 or 5 years ago, do you know what we Republicans did?

I am not trying to inject politics into this but just a statement of facts. We Republicans tried to fix the figure for the Federal Government's contribution at $20 to be matched by the States. We waged a battle for $20 but it was not accepted. Do not you think we should feel proud that the Democrats have seen the light? [Laughter.] They have seen the error of their ways. They have seen the equity of it, and they now come with us for a $20 a month proposition which I am sure we Republicans will support.

Let me tell you another thing about the bill we passed in 1935. The Democrats cannot claim credit for this whole Social Security Act, comprehensive as it was. Certainly not. It has 10 titles in it. One of the titles simply gives the name to the bill, so it has nine effective titles in it. One of those titles provides aid to the blind. When the original socialsecurity bill came from the White House it said nothing about the blind. We fought it out in the Ways and Means Committee, and the Democratic Party would not accept that provision for the blind, so that that party now has no right to claim that it is responsible for the pension the blind get in this country. We Republicans made the fight on the floor of the House and tried to get the Democrats to include the blind, but they declined to do it. The proposition received much support but not enough to carry it. The bill went to the Senate, and the Senate amended the bill with language almost identical with the amendment which we offered. So, Mr. Chairman, this bill is not a political bill, either Republican or Democratic. It is a bill that has in it many good features which have come from both parties and some which are not so good.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I am always glad to yield to my leader on our committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is too modest about the matter of the aid for the blind. He was the man who proposed it. [Applause.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I thank the gentleman, and I am proud of any small part I may have had in it. It is not necessary to mention that here. Let us go a little further. We had in this original bill a proposition that provided for aid for children. That was not initiated by the New Deal. We had that in the Federal law. We had in the Federal law rehabilitation features. The biggest part of this important bill was already the law in some form or other. When we approach a discussion of this bill, let us consider these assistance features as being for the best interests of the country. We are all for these features in spirit; we may differ in method.

The other division into which this law will classify itself naturally is, as I have heretofore stated, the provision of insurance. I opposed title II 5 years ago. I oppose it now in my heart. Then I said it was unconstitutional, and I was opposed to it on the further ground that I felt it was not a wise program for the Government to assume. I shall not discuss what we did at that time, but I still insist that these insurance features have not put themselves by a 5-year trial on as firm a footing with the people as these other features have. I would be in favor of title II with all my heart if I felt it would benefit the workingman. The workingman needs immediate help when he needs it—not a rainbow 45 years away.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. In a minute. I want to drive this home. Observe this prophecy. We made it 4 years ago. We said this insurance proposition would not live because it is not built on proper insurance foundations, and it would not endure; it could not endure. They said that they would fortify it with this vast $47,000,000,000 reserve.

We opposed the big reserve then. We Republicans opposed it 2 years ago. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], one of our distinguished Members, and myself collaborating with other members of our party on the Ways and Means Committee, advanced our position and our reasons for it. Today we see what has happened and we can say, "I told you so." Now, what has happened? This bill provides for a change in the pay-roll tax rate which will do away with the $47,000,000,000 reserve. That was a 10-to-1 reserve. Now the bill provides a 3-to-1 reserve. Why do I mention this? I mention it because they have seen the light of day. They have come to our view by the irresistible force of facts. They see another thing. They see that these two insurance provisions will not stand on their feet from an insurance standpoint. They will not do it. Why do I say this? Let me take you to the majority report and show you what the majority report says. I want to compliment those who got it up. It is a splendid report. Particularly you younger Members who want to make speeches this summer on this proposition of the social security, may do well to take that report and also the minority report, which is equally and even more eloquent in its correctness than the majority report and it is even more responsible and illuminating, but it is not quite so voluminous. I want you to look in that report and see what has happened. Let us see what has happened. On page 15 they have a table that is really astounding. It scares me because it proves that the time is coming when these two insurance features are going to be nothing more nor less than social-benefit institutions. The Federal Government will have to maintain them.

Talk about taxes! This bill will reduce the tax two hundred and seventy-five million, on title II by reason of our freezing the pay-roll tax at 1 percent for 3 years instead of raising it to 11/2 percent on the employer and employee as the present law provides. But the tax will go up to 2 percent on each of these parties in 3 years from now. In 5 years it will go up again to 6 percent-3 percent on each. When it is up to its highest limit, 6 percent, we will run behind $81,000,000. Let me show you the figures. In 1940 we take in $501,000,000, and only spend eighty-eight million. In 1941 we take in five hundred and five million, and we only spend two hundred and eleven million. In 1942 we take in five hundred and four million, and we spend three hundred and fifty million. We are still ahead of the game. But in 1944, when we raise the tax, we take in $1,067,000,000 and we spend five hundred and ninety-eight million. In 1950 we take in $1,751,000,000, and we spend $1,389,000,000. When our employers will be paying 3 percent and the workingmen will be paying 3 percent, you can say whatever you please, you can laugh if you want, but when it reaches its limit of tax production, it will reach in 1955, $1,849,000,000, and we will spend $1,930,000,000. That is what we will spend. That will be a deficit of eighty-one million in that one year. What are we going to do then? You cannot raise the tax-you have told the people that this will carry it through, and this is not true. You cannot raise the tax, consequently you are going to dig down into your pockets to keep the gigantic institution going. Why? Because you will have a lot of people who paid for it, and you will say, "We cannot throw those fellows down now. We will have to do something about it." My friends, we are proceeding blindly, and the only result will be to deceive the people.

I tell you, just as sure as you live, that the United States Government has no business in the insurance business unless it runs it along the lines of insurance, unless it expects to come forward and make up the great deficits as it will have to do. Then, if it is not an insurance program, why not give it a descriptive name? Why deceive the millions of workers who are now under the Social Security? They are not voluntarily under it. It is compulsory. My friends, if it were optional, that would be entirely different, but when the Government compels many millions of its people to pay their money on an insurance plan that they have a right to believe will benefit them, only to find it to be a delusion, somebody will have committed a terrible legislative crime.

Who will answer me as to what we will do in 1956? As I have already shown, we are going to be compelled to dig into our reserve to the tune of probably four hundred million. In 1957 we will have to dig in a lot more. The next thing we will have our reserve all used up, regardless of whether it is I O U's or good regular United States bonds. We will be in the red so far that I do not know what we will do about it. It will be terrible to contemplate. If we could quit in 1956 without any evil consequences, that would be one thing, but you just simply cannot quit when you get that far along. Then you know what will be the result—appropriation upon appropriation, world without end.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I gladly yield to my able friend from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Will the gentleman just stress the fact that that is only 15 years away—a very, very short period in the time of a nation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes. That is what astounded me when I heard those men coming from the fiscal department of the Government say with such nonchalance, "Yes; in 15 years we will be out on a limb." They do not care. They know that the New Deal will be an old broken-down "old deal" by that time. They have never been compelled to meet a pay roll and they have never carried a dinner bucket, else they would be more interested.

What are we going to do about it? What is our obligation to posterity? We must be interested about this. It is a tremendous question. I do not know what is the best thing to do about it, but it seems that the best thing we can do is to separate these provisions of the social-security bill, so that we can administer what admits of administration. Let us Congressmen, representing the Federal Government, give these aged deserving people five or ten dollars a month more; let us encourage the States to do likewise; let us take care of these unfortunate widows with dependent children; let us take care of these rehabilitated people; let us take care of the public-health provision. I have not mentioned that yet, but that is an eminently proper governmental activity. The Government should take an interest in the control of epidemics and in health measures that are general in their scope. It ought to be ready to meet them financially. But when the Government gets into the insurance business or anything of that sort, they should know their business. When you tell a man 20 years of age, "Now, we are going to compel you to come under the social-security law, and if you will pay a certain percentage of your wages until you are 65, you will draw a pension. You are putting on him a tremendous task. You were never put under such a yoke. I dare say that if you had your choice you would not assume the load. I am not opposed to it if the people want it. But it is a tremendous thing to have about 45,000,000 people paying on a plan that will not carry through as they are now led to believe it will do. If you have made $18 or $20 or $25 a week for about 45 years, you will get about $40 a month when you get to be 65 years of age. The employer will have paid as much as you paid, yet you will have not as much as old-age pensioners should have now who have paid nothing in. If you die before you are 65, without a family, you will get nothing." And your widow will only get 6 months' benefits at the time of your death, and no more until she is 65. I am sorry my time is running short. I should like to discuss many other provisions of the bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Van Zandt].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago, some of us stood on the floor of this House pleading for the enactment of legislation which bid fair not only to provide immediate and adequate social security for the senior citizens of the country, but to contribute to the general welfare of all the people of the Nation.

During the debate on that measure some of us were somewhat critical of the present Social Security Act and the amendments now proposed to it. That criticism, however, was not directed at the broad principles of the law. No one ever has questioned the high purpose or the fundamental soundness of the social-security program. Our complaint was against the amount of protection provided in the present law and the proposed amendments for the elder citizens who are most in need of protection right now.

Our sole purpose was to supplement the law so as to give immediate and adequate social security to the needy elders, who are too advanced in years to enjoy the full benefit of the revised act, or any more liberal provisions which may be adopted in the future. It seems a pity that the publicspirited citizens, who have done so much to advance this program of protection against economic and social hazards, will not share as they should in the fruits of their labors. But that is the portion which frequently falls to the pioneers along the path of progress. They sow the seeds and future generations reap the harvest. They may solace themselves with the knowledge their efforts were not in vain.

But no matter how far short of meeting the present and pressing needs of those most deserving of adequate protection these amendments may fall, I shall support this measure on the theory that "half a loaf is better than none." There can be no question about the desirability of the amendments and the vast improvement they will make in the social-security program.

Among the many features of this measure, which are designed to improve and strengthen the present act, I am impressed particularly with the merit of two amendments. The first is the provision to keep social security secure. I refer, of course, to the provision creating a Federal old-age and survivor insurance trust fund to safeguard the insurance benefit funds. The second is the provision freezing the pay-roll tax. Those two amendments are calculated to contribute to public confidence in the Social Security Act.

Under the present administration we have witnessed some frenzied deficit financing. Public confidence in the entire social-security set-up was shaken when it was revealed that taxes paid into the social-security fund were being dumped into the general fund in the Treasury and were being used to finance the current expenses of the Government.

No trust imposed upon the Government is higher than the fiduciary capacity it serves with respect to the social security funds. Nothing could be more cruel to those who place a blind faith in the integrity of the Government than the misapplication of such funds. It is unpleasant to even contemplate the calamity that would befall this country if social security funds were squandered recklessly on all sorts of pump-priming projects. All danger of any such calamity, however, has been eliminated by the creation of a trust fund, ear-marked for social security purposes.

The freezing of the old-age insurance tax will have a far more wholesome effect than appears on the surface. Business men and especially small-business men in my district looked askance upon the automatic 50-percent increase in the old-age annuity tax, which was scheduled to begin in 1940. Businessmen, already heavily laden with taxes, were fearful lest the sharp increase in that levy would greatly disturb business and might result in further unemployment. An increase of about 15 percent in the Federal tax burden upon corporate employers, as it is estimated the higher rate would have imposed, is no small item to a businessman with a business budget. Such an increase in Federal taxes certainly would be a serious factor in preventing or at least delaying recovery.

Fortunately, the committee listened to the sound arguments presented by businessmen and allayed their fears by freezing the tax. The amendment would freeze at 1 percent the tax on the worker and 1 percent on the employer for the 3 years 1940, 1941, and 1942, as against the 1½-percent rates on each under the present act. That provision alone will save employers and workers about $275,000,000 in 1940, or a total of $825,000,000 in the 3 years.

Another provision which is designed to lessen the load on employers without lessening the benefits to the workers is worthy of mention. States may reduce their unemployment insurance contributions if a certain reserve fund has been attained and minimum benefit standards have been provided. It is estimated this provision may save employers from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 during 1940, if the States cut their contribution rates from 2.7 to 2 percent.

Employers stand to save another $65,000,000 a year under the unemployment-compensation provisions. This would be done by limiting the application of the tax to only the first $3,000 an employer pays to an employee for a year. Still another saving to employers of about $15,000,000 will be made under the provisions for refunds and abatements to employers who paid their 1936, 1937, and 1938 unemployment-compensation contributions late to the States.

In all, it is estimated that savings, chiefly to employers, aggregating about $1,700,000,000 may be effected in 3 years.

One of the chief virtues of the amendments is the provision under which payment of old-age insurance benefits will start next year, instead of in 1942. Other commendable amendments include the increased benefits to wives, widows, and dependents of insured persons and the inclusion of about 1,100,000 more persons under the law's old-age insurance provisions. And about 200,000 persons, chiefly bank clerks, are brought under unemployment insurance.

One of the vital clarifying amendments has to do with agricultural labor. The term "agricultural labor" is defined so as to exempt certain types of service and thus meet sound objections made by the farmers.

Another sound change is the abandonment of the plan to build up a $47,000,000,000 reserve fund for old-age insurance, and the adoption of a pay-as-you-go policy, with a moderate contingent reserve.

No one, not excepting the Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee, claims that even with the proposed amendments the Social Security Act is perfect or all inclusive. On the other hand, the Republican minority of the committee concedes the measure at least makes certain improvements in the present law—some of which we have ourselves heretofore suggested—which we believe justify us in supporting it despite its defects.

Because of the tendency on the part of some Democrats to claim all the credit for the Social Security Act, I wish to read one paragraph from the views of the minority, included in the official report on this bill. It states:

Republicans in both branches may deservedly be proud of the part they have played in calling to the attention of the country the dangers and burdens inherent in the present reserve structure, and in bringing about the changes proposed. The action taken by the committee is an acknowledgment of the soundness of the major Republican criticism of the existing law.

Let us hope the day is not far distant when we all can join in nonpartisan praise of a perfect Social Security Act, under which the holy trinity of democracy—the worker, the employer, and the Government—are linked in the fulfillment of America's destiny—adequate social security for all of our citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Kean].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, the fact that the criticism of the use by the Government of old-age trust funds for current expenses is amply justified seems to have been recognized by the authors of this bill, for a half-hearted attempt has been made to sugar-coat the present method; but the basic principle and basic wrong has not been corrected.

The bill now changes the name of the "old-age reserve account" to the "old-age trust fund," and instead of purchases being entirely under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is placed under the control of three trustees, namely, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Labor, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board; and it is provided that the money is to be used to purchase either original issues at par or outstanding obligations at the market price, and I O U's—special Treasury obligations—only if the trustees do not consider that to purchase either of the above two classes "is not in the public interest."

But this plan in no way goes to the root of the fallacy in the present system. The only way that a true trust fund can be provided is by limiting the purchases to bonds which are already outstanding. In this way only can you prevent these taxes from being used for current expenses.

The case is no different from that of a shopkeeper who has a pension to pay to an employee at some future date, and receives the money for this purpose. If he should take this money and use it for current expenses for his store and give himself an I O U, then when the time comes to pay the pension he will have to look somewhere else for the money. The same would result if he used the money to invest in part of a note or bond issue which he was selling to others.

The safe way in which he could assure himself of having the money when needed would be for him to take up from the bank one of his notes which is already outstanding. Thus when the pension comes due he can use the money which he has been putting aside to pay off the note.

There are only three ways in which these trust funds can be invested in Government securities. The fairest way, as I have mentioned, is the purchase of already outstanding securities.

The second is by the purchase of a portion of an original issue which is being offered to the public. This method the authors of the new bill seem to think is entirely justifiable; but, in my opinion, this would not make for an honest fund, for the Government only issues bonds when it needs the money for current expenses, and the money would, of course, be used for this purpose. The Treasury would in all probability increase the authorized amount of the loan by the amount of money which they knew the so-called trust fund would be purchasing.

I cannot see that this makes any more of a real trust fund than the present or third method, which is to sell to the fund Treasury I O U's at a specified rate of interest, as in both cases the money is used for current expenses.

The result of either of the last two plans is that the workingman is taxed and the money goes into the trust fund. The trustees then take the money which they have received and give it to the Treasury, which in turn issues to the trust fund either its I O U or a new bond "part of an original issue." Thus the Treasury has the money to spend for current expenses and the fund has the new bonds for the I O U's, but when the time comes that the fund must be used for the benefits provided for in the act the Treasury has spent the money years before; the money is gone, and in order to get the necessary funds to pay pensions due they must tax the people all over again.

As I said before, the only way that a real trust fund can be provided is by buying United States bonds which are already outstanding. As the money provided by the taxpayer and used by the trustees for purchase of these bonds goes to the owners of these bonds who have already paid the Government for them no new money will go to the Treasury for it to spend, and the money provided from the old-age taxes cannot be used for current expenses.

It has been said that we should not criticize this method as the same thing has been done in other cases by Republican Secretaries of the Treasury. It must be remembered, however, that in past times the money involved was a comparatively small amount; and whether it is done by Republicans or Democrats, it is wrong. I am perfectly willing to acknowledge that everything done by past Republican administrations was not perfect; and when we find a thing that is wrong, let us correct it.

It is easy to criticize, but those who criticize should propose a constructive solution; and, if no one else does, I propose to introduce an amendment tomorrow along the lines of H. R. 6156, which I introduced on May 4, 1939, which would accomplish the purpose of preventing the use of this trust fund for current expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Dondero].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time to ask a question and to set forth a situation which I believe obtains in the district of every Member of this House.

In nearly every community in the country there are small corporations that employ a few men and women. Some of them may only give employment to 4 or 5 people, others 8, 9, 10, or more. These little industries are the backbone of many little towns and cities and in their aggregate provide the pay roll, the employment, and the purchasing power of the people. Many of these concerns operate on a very small margin of profit while others are barely able to continue in business. In many instances they mean the very life of a community. If one of these small corporations employs 8 or more people, it comes under the payroll tax of the Social Security Act, amendments to such act now being before us as provided in the bill H. R. 6635. This provision of the law has deterred many small concerns employing less than 8 people from expanding or offering employment to others in order to avoid the penalty of the pay-roll tax. Such is the case in my congressional district. Undoubtedly such little industries felt they could not continue in business if they had to meet the added burden of such taxes. At least in this respect and in such instances the Social Security Act has retarded progress and recovery and added to the list of the unemployed.

As the law stands now an officer of such a corporation, a little corporation, who receives no salary whatever but who simply gives his name to the company, is included as one of the employees and figured in the basis for computing pay roll taxes. For example, if you had a company in your district that had seven employees drawing salary and two who were officers but who received nothing whatever from the company, who simply gave their names to the company because of family prestige and influence or community pride, nevertheless those two officers are considered as employees, the company would be charged with nine employees and compelled to pay a pay-roll tax based on nine employees even though two of them receive nothing from the company.

I particularly call the attention of the committee to page 63 of the bill, subsection (d) Where the term "employee" is defined to include an officer of a corporation. I wonder if the committee would not accept an amendment in substance as follows: "But exempting such officers and employees of a corporation who receive no compensation or salary whatever from such corporation"? The reason for this amendment is to keep alive and going in the little communities of the Nation small companies and corporations that are the backbone of the country, without subjecting them to the pay-roll tax on employees and officers who draw no salary. Perhaps the able distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper] wants to answer that question?

Mr. COOPER. I did not quite catch the full import of the gentleman's question.

Mr. DONDERO. The question is, Whether or not the committee has taken into consideration the effect of including in the number of employees in small companies those employees and officers of corporations who merely lend their names to the company but receive no compensation or salary whatever, thereby subjecting such small concerns to the payroll tax, whether or not the committee has considered the question of excluding them from the pay-roll tax imposed by this bill.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman will recall, of course, that the pending bill exempts all who are exempted under section 101 of the internal-revenue law. This takes care of chambers of commerce and a long list of institutions.

Mr. DONDERO. I understand that, but I have received correspondence from little corporations wherein they state they may have nine people employed but only seven receive any compensation whatever. Because of the fact that two are officers, although they receive nothing, the company is subjected to a pay-roll tax. That company is not a chamber of commerce; it is a little corporation that is trying hard to get along. What has the committee done to take care of a situation of that kind? Can the gentleman from California, a member of the committee, answer that?

Mr. BUCK. Are these corporations of which the gentleman speaks corporations operated for profit?

Mr. DONDERO. They are.

Mr. BUCK. I am afraid we have not done anything about

Mr. DONDERO. These two officers receive no compensation whatever; they simply give their names to the company.

Mr. BUCK. We have not covered such people. We have covered the situation in the cases of corporations exempt from taxation under section 101 of the revenue law.

Mr. DONDERO. It seems to me that an amendment covering such cases as I have mentioned might be advisable.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, with the main objectives of the pending social-security legislation, namely, the liberalization of benefits, I most heartily agree. No person with a heart and an understanding would be content with the pitifully inadequate benefits now paid to our worthy aged. It is our duty to do something more than has yet been done, or even attempted, to make the evening of their lives peaceful and secure.

Nevertheless, there are provisions of the pending bill to which we in Indiana must vigorously dissent because of their relation to the Indiana unemployment compensation program, and we will be hoping that somewhere in its progress through the legislative mill the bill will be amended so as to iron out these objectionable provisions.

In order that the House may understand the legitimate criticisms of those who speak for our Indiana business interests, I submit the following four objections to the bill presented by William H. Book, vice president of the Indianapolis Chamber of Commerce.

The chamber of commerce of our city is one of the best organizations of its kind in the country, and Mr. Book is an outstanding business executive who has had much experience in matters relating to public affairs. His four points of criticism are as follows:

1. Although the bill technically preserves the rights of States to operate under merit rating programs, the other provisions so increase the costs of the program as to substantially restrict the operation of merit rating. It may, in the practical operation, actually become increasing. become inoperative.

2. The prospect of tax reduction is minimized, if not entirely offset, by the increased benefit requirements, so that what is projected as a substantial saving in pay-roll taxes for unemployment compensation will in the long run prove to be an actual increase.

3. More difficult and expensive administrative requirements are set up in the full-time weekly wage basis of computing benefits required in the bill.

4. The bill is a long step toward federalization of unemployment compensation.

I also present a copy of a letter written by Mr. Book to Hon. John W. McCormack, the able member of the Ways and Means Committee in charge of this legislation. This letter follows:

Indianapolis, Ind., June 5, 1939.

Hon. John W. McCormack,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. McCormack: I shall attempt in this letter to outline the views of employers of Indiana, as I can interpret them from the conclusions of employers' committees and individual employers, regarding unemployment compensation program amendments contained in H. R. 6635.

It should be said at the outset that employers generally appreciate the effort that has been expended by yourself and other members of the Ways and Means Committee in placing in the bill you have drafted features which are calculated to give immediate relief from the growing tax burden on business. I refer particularly to the tax exemption on portions of annual salaries in excess of $3,000, to the permissive features allowing States to reduce of $3,000, to the permissive features allowing States to reduce unemployment compensation taxes on a uniform, State-wide basis, and to the Federal old-age benefit program amendment "freezing" the tax for another 3 years at 1 percent. I believe it is recognized by this time that employers are not entirely selfish in their efforts to obtain relief from growing tax burdens, but instead have sound basis for their contention that everyone will profit through the softening of tax deterrents to industrial expansion and growth.

There are several specific features of H. R. 6635 with which business groups of Indiana do not agree, for, they feel, sound reasons. These I pass on to you entirely in a constructive spirit.

Probably the major point of disagreement with the bill lies in the minimum benefit standards which are established, particularly in the duration requirement of 16 times the weekly benefit amount. Careful analysis has shown that this requirement would increase total benefit payments in Indiana—and hence the total cost borne total benefit payments in Indiana—and hence the total cost borne eventually by employers—approximately 20 percent. The establishment of flat duration standards also is felt to be an abandonment of insurance principles and a step in the direction of the relief concept of unemployment compensation.

relief concept of unemployment compensation.

It is realized that an objection to the minimum-benefit standards immediately raises the controversial question of just what the level benefits should be. However, we feel that should be a matter largely of State determination, in accordance with conditions of each State. It must be recognized that if the unemployment-compensation program is to be successful, the economic benefits derived from it must outweigh its costs. There obviously is a point to which benefit costs of the program might go which would defeat the program. There is not sufficient experience yet to know what that point is, and employers of Indiana feel that the Federal Government would be establishing a dangerous precedent in fixing as minimum-benefit standards a level which would result in increasing materially the benefit-payment costs of nearly all State proing materially the benefit-payment costs of nearly all State programs.

Specifically, employers are not convinced that the Federal law should prescribe any minimum-benefit standards. However, if it is to be conceded that Federal minimum standards are necessary in the case of States wishing to apply uniform, State-wide tax reduction, the standards set up in the Ways and Means Committee bill should be modified to the point where they will serve exclusively as protection against possible State action reducing benefits to an unreasonably low level—rather than standards compelling States to raise their present benefit levels.

States to raise their present benefit levels.

Employers also feel it would be a mistake to include in the benefit-standard requirements language which may later be interpreted by the Social Security Board as requiring strict adherence by States to the full-time weekly wage base in the determination of weekly benefit amounts. If States should be required to base or weekly benefit amounts. It States should be required to base weekly benefit computations on what, in effect, is the wage an individual would have earned had he been employed full time at his regular rate of pay, almost insurmountable administrative and employer-reporting difficulties will be created, as States which have tried the full-time weekly wage base have learned. The highest quarterly wage base, such as is used in Indiana, approximates the full-time weekly wage base insofar as the henefit applicant is full-time weekly wage base insofar as the benefit applicant is concerned, but is much simpler of administration. Indiana employers feel that there should be some such change in H. R. 6635, as the elimination of the terms "full time" where they appear on page 73 of the bill, and the insertion, after the word "earnings" in line 12, page 73, of the words "as defined in State law." This would leave the definition of weekly earnings to State legislative

The effect of the bill on State merit-rating programs is of primary concern to Indiana employers. I realize that the bill permits a State, if it has the prescribed balance in its fund and if it meets the prescribed minimum-benefit standards, to have State-wide tax reduction, individual merit rating, or a combination of both. However, the estimated 20-percent increase in benefit costs which would be involved in Indiana's compliance with the benefit standards would result in a substantially more narrow margin within which merit rating might operate, defeating it completely for some employers. Unless employment conditions improve materially, the margin would be so narrow as to render merit rating almost wholly ineffective for all employers.

If a State did not have the prescribed balance in its fund or

If a State did not have the prescribed balance in its fund or did not choose to meet the minimum benefit standards, under subsection (a) of section 1602, as amended, it would be required to levy taxes that would produce the equivalent of a 2.7-percent rate on total pay rolls of the State subject to the unemployment compensation program. It is obvious that under such circumstances merit-rating programs, for practical purposes, would be nullified. It is the consensus, specifically, that States which prefer to remain exclusively on the individual merit-rating basis—in preference to State-wide reduction or a combination of the two—should not be compelled to meet the one and one-half times reserve renot be compelled to meet the one and one-half times reserve requirement or gear their rates to a 2.7-percent average as long as they have a set-up definitely guaranteeing payment of all benefits to which unemployed workers are entitled. We are quite certain that Indiana has such a guaranty in its adequately protected partial pool set-up.

I should state that at a recent conference of representatives of business groups from Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Missouri, views expressed by the representatives from the other States were substantially the same as those which I have outlined in this letter.

Generally speaking, the belief of Indiana employers is that there should be no more than the necessary minimum of Federal regulation of State programs, and under no circumstances should there be interference with the freedom of States to encourage stabilization of employment by means of merit-rating programs. In the long run, this will accomplish far more for the good of employees and employers alike than the boosting of the amount of cash benefits—a procedure which, when carried to the extreme, cculd result only in the collapse of the unemployment compensation program.

As explained to you by Mr. Howard Friend, I was ill the latter part of last week and am sorry that I was not able to get to Washington to talk with you. It appears now that the Indiana group probably will not be in Washington until such time, following your suggestion in your letter of June 3 to Mr. Friend, as the bill is under consideration by a Senate committee. We shall hope to have the opportunity to talk to you at that time.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM H. BOOK.

In conclusion, I present the summation of a special report of the governmental research division of the Interorganization Council of Indiana, which outlines the views of Statewide business employers' organizations of Indiana which have given this matter the most serious study and consideration. The summation referred to follows:

SUMMARY

In this, an analytical treatment of major amendments to the Federal social-security law affecting unemployment compensation, as proposed by the Ways and Means Committee of the National House of Representatives in the pending bill, H. R. 6635, the following conclusions are reached in respect to their application to the Indiana program:

1. Tax exemption on portions of annual salaries in excess of $3,000 is a wholly justified correction of an existing inequity.

2. Permission to States to reduce contribution rates on State-wide basis is an immediate tax relief step but it is modified by specified conditions which would increase the program's ultimate cost to industry.

3. The 16-week minimum benefit duration requirement would increase total benefit payments in Indiana approximately 21 per-

4. Merit rating consideration: (a) Unless the State complied with minimum benefit requirements and established the specified minimum reserve, individual merit rating would be inoperative except to the extent that limited rate variations would assure aggregate collections equivalent to collections from a State-wide rate of 2.7 percent. (b) If the State qualified for a reduced State-wide rate and individual merit rating, the 21-percent increase in benefit payments materially would narrow the margin in which the individual merit-rating program and its incentive to the stabilization of employment might operate.

5. At existing or improved employment levels, minimum benefit standards of the bill could be met and the State-wide contribution rate reduced to 1.7 percent without "bankrupting" the Indiana fund, but operation of individual merit rating would be narrowly At lower employment levels, the ability of the Indiana program to meet benefit standards and maintain an adequate reserve qualifying the State for a reduced rate is very doubtful and indi-vidual merit rating would be completely nullified. 6. The full-time weekly wage base for the determination of weekly benefit amounts would create very serious administrative difficulties and would increase State administrative costs and costs of reporting by employers. It probably would increase total benefit payments, depending on how literally it might be administered.

7. Establishment of a flat duration of benefits would represent abandonment of insurance principles under which total benefits payable to an individual are related to his previous earnings and would be in violation of the concept of unemployment compensa-tion as an insurance—and not a relief—program.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6635) to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Johnson]?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this brief time to say that I am advised of the fact that there is a very definite disposition in some quarters to reduce the appropriation for the National Youth Administration next year below the President's budget as submitted to the committee from $123,000,000 to about $81,000,000. If such an unreasonable cut is actually submitted and permitted to be made, it is needless for me to say that it will seriously cripple the program of the National Youth Administration as now proposed for the coming year. I think Members on both sides of the aisle will agree with me that the work of the National Youth Administration is one of the outstanding accomplishments of this or any other administration. There is a serious need for the extension of this great work throughout the Nation.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I wish to back up fully the statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma. It has been equally helpful in Arizona. No other expenditure has yielded a greater return than that made for the N. Y. A. School men in my State heartily approve of it. Let us put first things first. Let us think of the future and let us really think of posterity in taking proper care of our young people. If an attempt is made to cut off $40,000,000 from the N. Y. A. and give it to some other project, I want to stand by the gentleman in his opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I appreciate the gentleman's statement, coming as it does from one of our leading educators who knows and appreciates the many perplexing problems of youth. I may say that many other outstanding school men of the country have taken the same position. In my own State of Oklahoma many high-school superintendents and college presidents have wired and written me commending very highly the N. Y. A. program and urging its extension.

Under permission just granted me I am placing in the RECORD at this point a very informative letter I have received from Hon. A. L. Crable, superintendent of public instruction for the State of Oklahoma, in which he gives some facts and figures relative to the program being carried on by the N. Y. A. in the State of Oklahoma. It is well worth reading. The letter is as follows:

> STATE OF OKLAHOMA, DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION, Oklahoma City, June 2, 1939.

Hon. JED JOHNSON,

United States Congressman, House of Representatives

Washington, D. C.
DEAR CONGRESSMAN JOHNSON: The State department of education wishes to go on record with the high school and college officials of the State of Oklahoma in expressing appreciation for the N. Y. A. student aid furnished our youth. Without this aid, the majority of these young people would have been deprived of the opportunity to take advantage of the privileges offered by the school system of the State.

I am informed by the State officials of N. Y. A. that during the fiscal year approximately 12,000 high-school students and 2,500 college students were assisted each month, at an annual expenditure for high school students of $309,547 and $265,680 for college students.

The distribution of N. Y. A. school aid in this State was based on the relief load and school populations of each county. This method of distribution seems to be one that is highly satisfacmethod of distribution seems to be one that is highly satisfactory. The N. Y. A. college-aid allocation was authorized by the National Youth Administration office at Washington, D. C., and was based on a percentage of the enrollment in each college. This method of distribution also seems to be highly satisfactory. Reports from the college officials reveal that the enrollment in the colleges has increased greatly by virtue of this N. Y. A. college aid. It is likely that hundreds of these students could not, under any circumstances, have been able to attend college without assistance from the National Youth Administration. I am informed that in a survey made January 12, 1939, the total without assistance from the National Youth Administration.

I am informed that in a survey made January 12, 1939, the total number of students applying for N. Y. A. college-aid assistance was 13,935, and the total enrollment in the colleges in November 1938 was 28,909. Since the applications for college aid far exceeded the number of students who could possibly have been employed by the appropriation allotted to Oklahoma, it is evident that thousands of these applicants are still not in college.

The total number of approved applications for school aid on January 12, 1939, was 13,825. Since that report was made several hundred additional applications have been received in the National Youth Administration office. The number of student allocations to Oklahoma was 5,732. The average payment for highschool students was approximately $3 per month, which indicates that the State has a need for additional allocation if the number of needy students are to be adequately served.

The average payment to college students was approximately $11 per month. This meager monthly payment indicates that the per month. This meager monthly payment indicates that the college officials are attempting to serve a larger number of students than the allocation to the State was intended. It will be noted from the above data that the amount of money allocated to the State of Oklahoma is being used to serve as many needy students as possible.

The work program to which these students are assigned within the work program to which these students are assigned within the schools seems to be generally well planned and well supervised by the school officials. The work in itself has given many students a much-needed training that they could not otherwise have had. In a recent survey of School Aid I find that reports were received from 668 high-school officials, which revealed the following information:

mation:

There was 4.5 percent of the enrollment of 197,069 employed on N. Y. A. school aid; 13.8 percent of the students on the State honor roll were employed on N. Y. A.; 32 percent of the valedictorians and 31.4 percent of the salutatorians were N. Y. A. students; the average grade for all students was 83.6 percent; and the average grade for N. Y. A. students was 84.5 percent. These figures indicate that the students employed on N. Y. A. are scholastically worthy students.

The high school and college officials seem to be universally well The high school and college officials seem to be universally well pleased with the student-aid program. In the report mentioned above, 61.7 percent of the high school officials asked that the allocation be increased and 35.2 percent asked that the amount of allocation remain the same. A great number of unsolicited letters have been written to N. Y. A. officials by high school superintendents and principals, expressing appreciation for such a program as this and have indicated that it is serving a worthy purpose and that they are anxious that the program be made a permanent one. permanent one.

Recent reports from college officials have shown that many students employed on N. Y. A. college aid have graduated with high honors and have brought honors to themselves and to the schools in many activities.

The work program in the colleges has lent itself to the further development of the students in the work in which they expect to be employed after leaving school. The program has operated smoothly throughout the State and the school officials have not smoothly throughout the State and the school officials have not been dictated to in any way concerning the employment of the students or the operation of the program, except for the general regulations as outlined by the National N. Y. A. office at Washington, which regulations seem fair and reasonable.

It is the desire of the school men of the State of Oklahoma that Student Aid be continued and, if at all possible, be established as a permanent department of the Federal Government, in order to continue, in this way, the granting of an opportunity to youth whose services and lives might otherwise be lost to our scciety.

Very truly yours,

A. L. Crable.

State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

FRIDAY, JUNE 9, 1939

The Senate, under the terms of Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, met at 10:30 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Z@Barney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all wisdom and might, breathe upon this assembled company, the Members of the Senate, the spirit of Thy gracious power as they wait here in Thy presence. May this be a memorable day in the history of our two nations, as human hearts beat in harmony and human hands are clasped in international friendship, pledging fealty and devotion to those high ideals to which our great democracies are dedicated. Make each one of us to feel as never before that in our Nation's Capitol we stand on holy ground; that a holy God inspires us and will through us bestow the beneficent gifts of hospitality upon our royal guests, so radiant in their youthful spirits, as they reveal in two united hearts the sovereign majesty of love; and let the benediction of Thy peace be upon us all, now and forevermore. THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, June 8, 1939, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CONGRESSIONAL WELCOME TO KING GEORGE VI AND QUEEN ELIZABETH OF GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. Pittman], chairman of the Joint Committee on Arrangements and Reception, has a statement to make.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, Their Majesties the King and Queen of Great Britain will be met at the foot of the central steps in front of the Capitol at 11 o'clock a. m. by the Joint Committee on Arrangements and Reception, and will be escorted into the rotunda, where they will be received by the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The Vice President and the Speaker of the House will then escort them to the positions which they will occupy during the reception. The Members of the Senate will be presented to Their Majesties by the chairman of the joint committee.

When the Senate leaves its Chamber, the Members of the Senate will proceed through the rotunda to a section which is roped off on the southwest side of the rotunda, the portion nearest to the House. That is for the reason that the Members of the Senate and the House will move to the left after they greet Their Majesties. The Members of the Senate, being first to be presented, will be in the section nearest to the House, and the House Members will be in the section nearest to the Senate side of the rotunda. After the Members of the Senate are presented, they will proceed to the north side of the rotunda; that is, the side nearest the Senate. The House Members will then proceed to the section the Senate had originally occupied, and there the Members of the House will stand until they are presented.

Mr. President, I think that gives a clear idea of the program. Of course there will be no address, except on the part of Their Majesties. There will be six in the receiving line. The committee of the Senate will stand in the front line during the presentation of the Members of the Senate. After the Members of the Senate have been presented, the Senate committee will drop back and the House committee will take their place, and the ceremony will proceed.

There will be no individual introductions whatever, because time will not permit, as only 45 minutes are available for the ceremony. As Senators approach Their Majesties their names will be announced; they will shake hands with the King and Queen without any comment. The formal address is "Your Majesty."

It is planned that the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives shall be in their positions at the time when Their Majesties are escorted into the rotunda.

After the Vice President and the Speaker have taken their positions near the door they will receive Their Majesties in the rotunda. The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borahl], being the senior Member of the Senate, will lead the Senate in the presentation of the Members to Their Majesties.

At 10 o'clock and 40 minutes a. m., the Committee on Arrangements and Reception on the part of the Senate, consisting of Hon. Key Pittman, of Nevada, chairman of the joint committee; Hon. Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky; and Hon. Charles L. McNary, of Oregon, withdrew from the Chamber and proceeded to the steps leading to the main entrance on the east front of the Capitol, where they joined the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, consisting of Hon. Sol. Bloom, of New York; Hon. Sam Rayburn, of Texas; and Hon. Joseph W. Martin, Jr., of Massachusetts, and received Their Majesties, who were escorted into the rotunda in the following order:

On the left of the King, Senator PITTMAN;

On the right of the King, the Queen;

On the right of the Queen, Representative Bloom.

Immediately following Their Majesties were Senators Barkley and McNary and Representatives Rayburn and Martin.

The Right Honorable William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, Minister in Attendance, was next in line, followed by the British Ambassador, Sir Ronald Lindsay, and Lady Lindsay, and Their Majesties' entourage.

In the rotunda the reception lines for the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, were as follows:

The Chair further desires to suggest that Members refrain from smoking and after their presentation to Their Majesties they take the place provided for them in the rotunda and remain there until Their Majesties leave.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the liberty of suggesting that in forming the procession to proceed to the rotunda that, as far as it may be feasible, the older Members of the House—that is, those ranking in seniority of service—form at the head of the line. Of course, it will be very difficult to carry that out, but the older Members will recognize their terms of service. There is no restriction or regulation about that, but that has been suggested on the part of the Committee on Arrangements.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The House will now stand in recess.

Accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 37 minutes a. m), pursuant to Senate Concurrent Resolution 17, the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 12 o'clock noon.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING MEMORIAL ADDRESSES

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for filing memorial addresses be extended 15 days after the expiration of the time provided by House Resolution 160. I believe this time expires today.

The SPEAKER. Legislative or calendar days?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the consent heretofore granted for filing memorial addresses be extended for 15 legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. St. Claire, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 591. An act to amend the United States Housing Act of 1937, and for other purposes; and

S. Con. Res. 19. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of House Document No. 272, current session, entitled "Message From the President of the United States Transmitting a Report of the Bureau of Public Roads on the Feasibility of a System of Transcontinental Toll Roads and a Master Plan for Free Highway Development."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein a speech of Bishop Galloway. I found on receiving the proof that this speech exceeds the limit, so I sent for and got an estimate, as required. I ask unanimous consent that I may insert this entire speech in the Record as a part of my remarks made on June 5.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Record and include therein information from the Commonwealth Federation of New York to substantiate my own remarks.

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on what subject does the gentleman expect to extend his remarks?

Mr. THORKELSON. The remarks are with respect to subversive activities.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has already inserted so much material in the Congressional Record, most of which, as I have observed, being unjustifiable and without truth, that I am obliged to object until I have an opportunity to read the article or check the information.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in this extension I prove my remarks from their own publication.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects to the request.

COMMANDER JAMES T. BRADY

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce the death of Hon. James T. Brady, the department commander of the American Legion for the District of Columbia and the General Solicitor for the Veterans' Administration, one of the ablest and most efficient public servants I have ever known.

Jim Brady literally worked himself to death. He passed away suddenly at 2 o'clock this morning.

As chairman of the Veterans' Committee, having to deal with the Veterans' Administration, I can say advisedly that I have never come in contact with anyone connected with this Government who worked harder or more conscientiously than did Mr. Brady.

One of my friends in the Press Gallery once wrote:

Or what we do or what we hope to do Is like infinitesimal drops from out the blue; Specks of dust from far-off flying stars Lost in the wake of Venus and of Mars, Swept to oblivion out of view.

He never lived to realize the good he had done, but the example set by Jim Brady as a conscientious, devoted, and industrious public servant might well be followed by everyone connected with the Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

AMENDMENT OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6635) to amend the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6635, with Mr. WARREN in the Chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Reed.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the membership of the House fully realizes or appreciates the amount of time that has been spent by the Ways and Means Committee on this important legislation. I think it has been one of the most arduous and one of the most trying experiences I have had in some 20 years of legislation. The hearings have continued for more than 3 months. We have had hearings morning and afternoon on this bill, and I want it distinctly understood at the outset that there has been no political opposition to this bill, and there was not when it was before the House originally. It was a bill that was approved in the Senate by a vote of 76 to 7; it was approved by the President on August 14, 1935.

LXXXIV—435

I want to be perfectly frank with the Members of the House and state that I was one of the 33 who opposed the bill in its original form. I was in absolute sympathy with the objectives sought to be attained, but there were certain provisions in the bill of which I did not approve and which I felt would come back to plague the Congress and the country.

It is inconceivable that anyone would be opposed to the objectives of a bill of this kind; that is, a system of protection against unemployment, a scheme of annuities for industrial and white-collar employees, a plan for noncontributory oldage pensions for the needy, noncontributory pensions for the blind and for relatives caring for orphans and other destitute children, and an appropriation for the Public Health Service.

These are all very worthy objects, and you would find few men who would be opposed to them; but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that when the bill was first before the Congress it was my honest and firm conviction that the bill was unconstitutional, but evidently the Supreme Court thought otherwise, and it is now the law of the land. Outside of that objection which I had to the bill, I am as heartily for the objectives now as I was in the beginning, and I think a great improvement has been made in this bill, and I doubt if there will be very much opposition to it.

This is not a perfect bill, far from it; in fact, there are very few pieces of perfect legislation that come out of a large legislative body. Most bills are a matter of compromise. There is bound to be great diversity of opinion as to just how certain objectives should be obtained. The New Deal Members seem to feel we are guilty of lese majeste if we offer any constructive suggestions to important legislation once it has been written at the other end of the Avenue.

Mr. Chairman, the New Deal Members of the majority have been very sensitive to any criticism of legislation emanating from the inner circle at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. The Social Security Act, as first presented to Congress, was so filled with glaring defects that it was inevitable that its provisions would have to be overhauled to avoid its utter ruin at the hands of an indignant public. The majority would not listen to the constructive criticisms of the Republican minority, nor would the New Deal Members of the majority consider proposals offered to improve the act.

Even now New Deal Members rush to the defense of the policy of spending the pay-roll taxes as they flow into the general revenues of the Treasury. The mere mention of I O U's is like a red flag to infuriated bulls. The fact that an income tax imposed upon the low-income groups and then used for the New Deal spending program does not impress the spenders as anything irregular or a proper subject for

I realize that not a thing I can say will quicken the conscience or bring home to those who act in the capacity of legislative guardians of a fund intended by the Congress to pay old-age benefits, a realization that the money should not be diverted to other purposes. The fact that far in excess of a billion dollars has been collected in pay-roll taxes for the specific purpose of paying old-age benefits, and that all of this except a comparatively small amount has been used for other purposes seems to be of no consequence to those who are doing the spending. It is evident that the taxpayers now realize that as a result of this diversion of the funds so collected and spent by the New Deal, the money will have to be raised over again by taxation.

The Republican minority from the first has sought to direct attention to the injustice of taxing the working men and women of this Nation to furnish funds to be spent, wasted, and frittered away by a reckless spending administration. I know full well how futile it is to argue the injustice of such a program with those whose only interest seems to be to continue to obtain money to spend, regardless from what source derived or to what end the funds collected will be applied.

It is important, however, that the record should be kept straight for the benefit of the public. When the public is once in possession of the truth, the constructive suggestions of the Republican minority will receive more and more support, and the consequence will be a more just and workable law.

I want to quote what the Brookings Institution of Washington, D. C., has to say on this subject, social-security taxes and their use, for paying the current expenses of the New Deal spending program. I quote:

The primary criticism of the old-age annuity scheme relates to the accumulation of a huge reserve. The plan involves the accumulation by the yearly payments and the interest thereon, of a sum which will pay the annuity when the beneficiary reaches the required age.

The accumulations are invested in Federal Government obligations The accumulations are invested in Federal Government obligations yielding at least 3 percent return. If outstanding Government bond issues do not yield such a rate, special obligations yielding 3 percent are issued for the purpose. By the end of December 1933 the Government had issued two billions of such obligations, and these were turned over to the Social Security Board in lieu of cash collected from the social-security taxes. The Government is, of course, obligated to pay interest on these bonds to the Social Security Board. These bond accumulations are called reserves, and it is estimated. gated to pay interest on these bonds to the Social Security Board. These bond accumulations are called reserves, and it is estimated that by 1930 the accumulation would reach nearly $50,000,000,000. Under existing procedures the pay-roll taxes are used for operating expenses of the Government. Neither cash nor revenue-producing assets is being provided by the taxes. Thus the accumulating obligations under the social-security plan will have to be met by further taxation in the future. Such a development was not contemplated originally. It was assumed that the Budget would be balanced and that the social-security taxes could be used to reduce the existing Government debt, thereby lessening the Government's obligations.

that the social-security taxes could be used to reduce the existing Government debt, thereby lessening the Government's obligations, if not accumulating cash or other assets. The persistence of the deficit has meant that such a program could not be carried out.

The net effect of the pay-roll taxes to date has thus been to provide the Government with some revenue and to keep the Federal deficit a little lower than it would otherwise have been. As a method of raising money for the general expenses of the Government it is highly inequitable in its operation. A part of it falls on the low-income classes, and that which is collected from corporations is not levied with reference to their ability to pay. As we have seen, it bears heavily on small corporations. it bears heavily on small corporations.

If there were a balanced Budget and the social-security taxes were being invested in outstanding Government bonds, the reserve, so to speak, would be in the form of decreased Government liabilities rather than in the form of increased assets. It is apparent in any case that the so-called reserve is not analogous to that maintained by ordinary insurance companies which do not invest in their own obligations or create new I O U's, the payment of which would involve increased collections in the future from those insured.

The alternative to the accumulation of a huge reserve is a pay-as-you-go plan. Since under the present operation of the system the benefits will have to be paid out of general taxation in the future, we should cease beguiling ourselves into the belief that the building up of a reserve has any economic significance. We should raise such amounts of social-security taxes as are necessary to take care of current payments and to provide the modest reserves necessary to possible emergencies. This means a few billion dollars the most

The inauguration of this plan should be accompanied by the adoption of the principle of investing the modest contingent reserves that would be accumulating in outstanding Government obligations. This implies an abolition of the present system of guaranteeing a 3-percent return on the reserve in the form of Government obliga-tions delivered to the Social Security Board; the earnings on the investments should be determined by money-market conditions at the time of purchase rather than be arbitrarily set at a fixed mini-mum rate which may come to be out of line with market yields. This plan of actually investing the tax accumulations in outstanding bonds necessarily means that the social-security taxes cannot be used to meet Treasury deficits.

In short, this analysis implies a segregation of the administration of the social-security program from the ordinary financial operations of the Government

Under the pay-as-you-go plan we would not need to have nearly as high rates in the early years as under the present plan. The rates would start at a low amount and would increase in proportion to the increased age of the groups affected.

I call attention to the fact that the Brookings Institution after a most thorough and exhaustive study of the Social Security Act made the following recommendations:

1. The old-age annuities should be financed on a pay-as-you-go basis rather than by the accumulation of a huge reserve.

2. The rates for the old-age annuities should be temporarily reduced from 1 to one-half of 1 percent, and be subsequently increased only as benefit payments necessitate.

3. The modest continuent reserves should be invested in out-

3. The modest contingent reserves should be invested in out-standing Government bonds at current rates, and the financial administration of the system should be segregated from the fiscal operations of the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to all, except to the New Deal spenders, that the pay-roll taxes continue to flow in full volume from the pockets of the working men and women into the Treasury to be squandered for anything, and everything that can be devised by a group of happy-go-lucky spendthrifts. It is only natural to expect criticism from the New Deal spending, debt-creating advocates, but the Republican minority has come in for no more abuse from the New Deal devotees than has that wing of constructive critics, known as Jeffersonian Democrats who have resisted the unsound fiscal and financial policies of the present administration.

Mr. Chairman, Republican modesty might have prevented the minority from claiming credit for such improvements as appear in the bill now under consideration, but courtesy requires that we acknowledge with profound appreciation what the New York Times has had to say with reference to the contribution which the Republican minority has made to the measure under consideration. I quote, first, from an article by Mr. Arthur Krock under date of February 3, 1937, in this leading and outstanding Democratic newspaper:

Behind the concurrent resolution looking to improvements of the Social Security Act, jointly sponsored in Congress by a Republican group, is the story of an interesting experiment. The resolution represents a serious effort, after long study, to organize and publicly demonstrate an effective opposition technique in this heavily administration Congress. It turns on the contribution of ideas advantageous to legislation passed by the party in power instead of attempts to hamstring breass and embarrace attempts to hamstring, harass, and embarrass

The authors of the proposal and devisers of the technique which it is hoped the suggestion will illustrate and popularize are Senators Vandenberg and Townsend and Representatives Reed and JENKINS—all Republicans. They conferred long, earnestly, and often before they made their move. They do not doubt their resolution will be pigeonholed by the majority. But they believe the changes they propose in the fundamental mechanics of the Social Security Act, being fundamentally sound, will eventually be adopted under the auspices of the administration.

The article goes on to say:

The four Republicans who composed the resolution did not rely on their own resources or information. They approached the best experts they could find, nonpartisan and in favor of social security. They accepted numerous suggestions * * *. What the Republican conferees sought to evolve was a sustained piece of constructive critical work, and they believe they succeeded. They approached the problem as national, nonpartisan, and economic, too worthy to be the object of a political gesture and realizing also that worthy to be the object of a political gesture, and realizing also that especially in such a matter, the least politics is the best.

The basis of the constructive criticism of the resolution's authors can be summarized as follows: It is most important to put the contributory old-age pension system on a firm and practical footing. It is not so grounded at present. The full reserve set-up is the flaw, with its eventual accumulation of forty-seven billions to be invested in Government 3 percents.

Any such fund, in the opinion of the Vandenberg group, is sure to be politically used in a democracy, and meanwhile the accumu-lation reduces the available revenues for current old-age pensions. They believe the arrangement doubly penalizes the worker because, while exacting a high tax, it deprives him of the present fruits of his investment.

The sponsors would eliminate the full reserve requirement of the existing law, substituting a modest contingent reserve, and thus release a large share of the pay-roll tax revenue, using the saving for one of two purposes. First, to hasten or increase the payment of old-age pensions. Second, to reduce the pay-roll tax to 2 percent for an indefinite period and avoid the graduated increase for a long

After pointing out the Republican opposition to the huge reserve, the article concludes as follows:

It can readily be seen that this is neither sniping nor the old political device of trying to dig a hole for the enemy, regardless of whether, when he falls in, his good public works, as well as his bad,

Now, let us see what Mr. Krock had to say in the Democratic New York Times on March 28, 1939, with reference to the effect of the minority's efforts to amend the Social Security Act:

CONSTRUCTIVE VERSUS PARTISAN CRITICISM OF NEW DEAL LAWS

In February 1937 four Republican Members of Congress intro-In February 1937 four Republican Members of Congress introduced a concurrent resolution looking to improvements in the Social Security Act * * *. The four Republicans were Senators VANDENBERG and TOWNSEND and Representatives Reed and Jenkins.

* * * As was remarked in this space at that time, these Republicans "approached the problem as national, nonpartisan, and economic, too worthy to be the object of a political gesture, realizing that in such a matter the least politics is the best."

NATURE OF RESOLUTION

Their concurrent resolution was based as follows:

"It is more important to put the contributory old-age pension system on a firm and practical footing. It is not so grounded at present. The full reserve set-up is the flaw, with its eventual accumulation of $47,000,000,000 to be invested in governments, at 3 percent. Any such fund in a democracy is sure to be politically used, and meanwhile the accumulation reduces the available revenues for current old-age pensions. The present arrangement doubly penalizes the worker because, while exacting a high tax, it deprives him of the present fruits of his investment. These it deprives him of the present fruits of his investment. These Republicans proposed elimination of the full reserve requirement, substituting a modest contingent reserve and thus releasing a large share of the pay-roll tax revenue. They sought to use the saving to hasten or increase the payment of old-age pensions, or to reduce the pay-roll tax to 2 percent for an indefinite period and avoid the graduated increase for a long time. * * * "Only a part of the suggestions of 1937 have been met by the administration, and all the faults of the Social Security Act have by no means been marked for remedy. But a large step toward no means been marked for remedy. But a large step toward improvement has been paced by Mr. Morgenthau and for the first time the President has completely assented to a major New Deal law revision which is simultaneously a candid admission of error and a cooperative move for business recovery.'

[Applause]

The trouble with that is that when the law was written it was speedily passed for political purposes. Even the slogan "Social Security," the title of the act, was a catch phrase, and led every person in distress to believe that at last here was legislation that was going to build the Eutopia of which he had so long dreamed, but today we are confronted with a practical situation, with a situation of doing what the country can afford to do in its present economic condition. We sought by months of hard labor, in a nonpartisan way, cooperating in every way possible with the majority to perfect this bill. I say to the membership of the House that while there are many shortcomings in the bill, yet it is so superior to the original bill, and as it has now been pronounced by the Supreme Court the law of the land, that I shall vote to pass this measure. I hope also that it will not be so far amended by overenthusiastic people as to emasculate the provisions intended for the benefit of those for whom the law was enacted to help.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If we have a moment, I think we might develop this thought a little bit. At the present time, as these tax remittances are made to the Treasury by industry, collected from the employee and from industry, they go to the general fund of the Treasury?

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And they are appropriated out by acts of Congress, to be used for the general purposes of the country, instead of being appropriated out for the purchasing of debt obligations previously issued by the Government. Therefore the present act calls for the issuance of special obligations to which the gentleman has referred. Later on, when the recipients of the benefits desire to collect something the Government must go out and tax the people to get the money in order to pay the recipients of the benefits, and while that is going on the special obligations are reflected in the debt of the Government.

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The special debt obligations do not show up in the deficit, figured as such, but they do show up in the increased debt of the Government. If, instead of following that procedure, we purchased Federal debt obligations previously issued, the deficit figure would show up in a greater sum, and might be embarrassing politically, but at the same time we would be accumulating as a reserve fund previously issued debt obligations incurred in running the Government. and those debt obligations then would be thrown into the fund and the interest which they would accumulate would help pay the benefits to the beneficiaries in the subsequent years. As I understand the gentleman's quotations from the Brookings Institute, that is what they recommend, and that is in line with the original philosophy of the minority group of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wanted to get that point cleared up.

Mr. REED of New York. We pointed that out from the very start. Of course, I do not need to say to this House that it is human nature, whenever a legislative body sees a vast accumulation of funds in the Treasury, to appropriate those funds for other purposes. It is a dangerous procedure. As I say, this does not correct the situation entirely, but it goes a long way in cutting down the large reserve, and cutting it down to a reasonable basis of about 3 to 1, or something like that.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. I have been very much impressed with the statement the gentleman has made, but the thought which has come to my mind, and which I would like the gentleman to consider is this: In the year 1970 he states that we would have accumulated about $47,000,000,000.

Mr. REED of New York. That is right.

Mr. SIROVICH. We will suppose $40,000,000,000 had been accumulated. That money could wipe out the complete tax-exempt securities in which the wealthiest people of the country have invested. As I say, the securities are tax exempt, and the money has not gone into business and industry, and if an amendment could be offered to the social-security bill that the $1,800,000,000 that we have now received thus far, and every year, should be utilized for the retirement of tax-exempt securities, then the Government would retain the interest, and this money would be forced into private industry and would tend to employ the army of unemployed. What about that?

Mr. REED of New York. Let me tell the gentleman what would happen in that event. All you would have accumulated are just these 3 percent I O U's, and the money in the meantime collected would have been spent. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Did the gentleman vote the other day for the bill to remove the partition and permit the Government to issue $15.000.000.000 or more of long-term bonds in lieu of short-term notes?

Mr. SIROVICH. I do not think I was here at the time.

Mr. REED of New York. The gentleman's side passed that bill and there is nothing now to prevent the Treasury from issuing $15,000,000,000 more of tax-exempt securities, which the majority has been condemning so much.

Mr. SIROVICH. Could we today offer an amendment at the proper place that all of this money that is obtained for old-age security and old-age assistance should be utilized only for one thing now and that the retirement of tax-exempt securities?

Mr. REED of New York. I am not so sure whether you can do that or not. I do not mean to be short with the gentleman from New York, but of course there is a constitutional question involved. It is very serious.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. In questioning another member of your committee the other day I learned that the funds to be raised by this taxation of the employer and employee are used exclusively for the purpose of paying benefits to the contributing employees when they reach retirement age. Is that correct?

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman state that question once more, please?

Mr. HINSHAW. That the funds raised through the 1-percent tax on employer and employee are to be paid through the trust fund exclusively for the benefit of those who have contributed to the fund—that is, the employees who have contributed to the fund, and for no other purpose. Is that correct?

Mr. REED of New York. That is what we plan.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is there any tax plan set forth in the bill that would provide for the other payments that are authorized by the bill, such as old-age assistance and aid to the blind, and so forth?

Mr. REED of New York. No.

Mr. HINSHAW. Then payments for these purposes come out of the Federal Treasury?

Mr. REED of New York. They come out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. HINSHAW. Or Federal deficit, shall we call it?

Mr. REED of New York. General taxes.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. HOLMES. I want to make an observation along the line of that made by our colleague, Dr. Sirovich. Why should the suggestion be made that this small group of about one-quarter or one-third of our population who contribute to this pension fund—I mean employers and employees—should alone be the ones who should assume the burden of this whole tax when there are millions of professional men—doctors, lawyers, and men of wealth—who do not contribute in any shape or manner to this fund? If we are going to retire this huge sum of billions of dollars it should be by all the people, because it is their obligation and not this particular group of manufacturers and employees who should be called upon to assume all the burdens of wiping out this tremendous bonded indebtedness.

Mr. REED of New York. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As an employer I would like to ask the gentleman this question: When this law became operative originally a contract was made between the Government and some of my employees stating that those employees would be paid a certain amount upon retirement, or in case of their death their estates would receive a certain amount. This bill, I notice, changes those payments entirely. Is that true?

Mr. REED of New York. It does. It changes the contract that was entered into. It modifies it considerably.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It changes the contract which was made, under which these men have paid in their money as employees and under which contract I have paid in as employer?

Mr. REED of New York. The original conception and philosophy of this bill was this, and it so went out to the country, and workingmen and employers believed it: That every person who paid a pay-roll tax looking forward to oldage benefits would be assured of one thing—that he would get all the money back that he paid in, plus interest.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And under this law he will not, if he dies before he reaches 65?

Mr. REED of New York. That is true. It has been modified.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And there is a direct damage and injury to a number of men in the higher brackets; is that not true?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman one other question. What is there to prevent this Congress or a Congress 10 or 20 years from now from changing this law entirely and taking away further benefits that the men are supposed to receive from the money they have paid in?

Mr. REED of New York. Not one thing, because one Congress cannot bind another. It is simply the conscience of the sovereign

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And, of course, governmental contracts no longer hold in the United States under our present Court?

Mr. REED of New York. That is correct.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to page 95. I notice the bill carries this provision: That the Federal Government will pay an amount, which shall be used exclusively as aid to the blind, equal to one-half of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as aid to the blind under the State plan, and so forth, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $30. In other words, it leaves the blind with a $30 limitation, while we are giving the old-age pensioners $40 at 65 years.

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Does it not seem that a blind person should be entitled to the same amount as the aged receive?

Mr. REED of New York. Of course; that is the danger of late amendments to a bill—not going through and correcting all discrepancies. I assume there will be some effort made on the floor to equalize some of the inequalities. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 37 minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, the Social Security Act, approved on August 14, 1935, is the greatest piece of social legislation ever enacted at any one time in the history of this or any other country in all the world. Many of the leading countries of the world have programs for social security. Most of those programs have been built up over a period of years, in some instances as many as 20 years being necessary to build up the program. They would provide for one phase of it, perhaps old-age pensions, and later they would provide for unemployment compensation, and so on; but this is the first country in the history of the world that ever adopted a rounded-out program for social security at one time.

It was my privilege to be a member of the subcommittee in 1934 that gave considerable time and attention to a part of the program embraced in the present act. It was also my privilege to be a member of the subcommittee which did most of the work in the drafting of the present Social Security Act. It is a little difficult for us sometimes to fully understand statements and charges made here on the floor, especially by some of our friends who cannot resist the temptation to be just a little partisan now and then, and to hear the statements made that this bill was sent up from the other end of the Avenue, and that it was hastily enacted by Congress. Now, as one who is in a position to know something about the real facts, I want to say to you that I have never known any measure that received more careful, thorough, and painstaking consideration by a standing committee of the Congress, or a bill more of which was actually written by the committee than the present Social Security Act. [Applause.] To those of us who labored so long and so hard in the drafting and the enactment of this legislation, the surprising thing has been that the program has succeeded to the remarkable extent that it has and that it has worked so successfully.

Let us bear in mind that we were plowing new ground. There were no precedents in this country to guide us and few precedents in other countries of the world, because, after all, we have a decidedly different situation in this country to what they have in most of the other countries of the world. We realized at the time that, although we were doing the best job we could, further amendments would be necessary and changes in the light of experience would be found to be expedient and advisable. This legislation has been considered all the way through, in 1934, in 1935, and the pending bill, on a nonpartisan basis. There has been no partisanship manifested by members of the committee during the consideration of this measure; and as one of the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, I am glad to acknowledge our debt of gratitude to the minority members of the committee who have cooperated with us and assisted so much in the consideration of this important legislation. [Applause.] We are also indebted to Mr. Rice, of the drafting service, and the members of the staff, and the Chairman of the Social Security Board and his very efficient corps of workers who have worked with us and assisted us all the way through in the consideration of this legislation.

This legislation stands today as a great tribute to the foresight and the wisdom of that great humanitarian, that man whose heart beats in tune with the interests and the welfare of the masses of our people, our great President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.] This program was the outstanding objective of Mr. Roosevelt during the second 2 years of his first administration. The present Social Security Act passed the House by a vote of 372 to 33 and passed the Senate by a vote of 77 to 6.

The Social Security Act, which contains substantially the provisions for insurance as was reported by the Ways and Means Committee, has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in three different cases.

The enactment of the Social Security Act marked a new era in this country. For the first time the Federal Government accepted the responsibility of providing a systematic program of protection against economic and social hazards. The first part of the program is designed to reduce future dependency. The second part of the program is designed and intended to relieve existing needs. The first part of the program provides for a Federal system of old-age insurance and for a Federal-State program for unemployment compensation. The second part of the program provides for grants to States for a program of aid to the needy aged, for dependent children, for needy blind, as well as providing for assistance to public health, maternal and child welfare, and other similar types of assistance.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that particular point?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.
Mr. SHORT. I just wondered, the gentleman from Tennessee, who has studied this matter so thoroughly, if he can tell the Committee why no assistance is included for helpless

Mr. COOPER. I am glad the gentleman asked that question because he and the membership of the House are entitled to an explanation on that point. The Social Security Board recommended the inclusion of a provision for total permanent disability cases at some time in the future. It pointed out, however, that not only would a large additional amount of expense be involved, but they stated that, in their opinion, it would probably require a year or 2 years to be able to work out a proper program for its administration. Your committee, therefore, in view of that information from the Social Security Board, decided not to include a provision in this bill for total and permanent disability cases.

Mr. SHORT. But I am sure that the gentleman from Tennessee will agree with all of us that a person with two legs off, or two arms off, is just as helpless, and as much in need, and as deserving of assistance as a person 60 or 70 years of age.

Mr. COOPER. There is no question about the desirability of trying to take care of cases of that kind. There is no doubt about all of us being interested and anxious to do all we can along that line.

Mr. SHORT. Is the Social Security Board at this time making a study of this program and when will they report to the Congress?

Mr. COOPER. The Social Security Board is continuing its study, and, of course, under the Social Security Act as drafted and passed, the Social Security Board is required to continue its study on all phases of social security and make reports to the Congress.

Mr. SHORT. I hope they will soon report favorably in the matter of assistance to these helpless cripples.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. DUNCAN. Along the line of the inquiry by the gentleman from Missouri I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if there is not included in the bill a provision for vocational rehabilitation to take care of the type of people referred to by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. COOPER. That is true. Of course, under the present Social Security Act there is provision made for the Federal Government to make grants-in-aid to the States to care for people injured in industry and otherwise and to provide rehabilitation for them. In this bill we increased the amount of the Federal grant by $1,000,000.

Mr. SHORT. But that is confined to those injured in industry?

Mr. COOPER. That is a program that has been going on for years. That particular appropriation has been increased by a million dollars.

Mr. DUNCAN. This applies not only to those injured in industry but to those injured otherwise?

Mr. COOPER. That is true.

Mr. GWYNNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GWYNNE. There seems to be some question about the employees of corporations under section 101. Is it the gentleman's understanding that an employee or an officer of a corporation under section 101 who receives no payment is not included?

Mr. COOPER. That is true.

Mr. GWYNNE. That is the proper construction?

Mr. COOPER. As I endeavored to reply to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Stefan] when he asked a similar question yesterday, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that he nor any other Member of the House is more interested and more anxious about that being taken care of than those of us on the committee. We certainly did everything we could and we received the assurance that the provisions of this bill takes care of that situation.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. Referring back to the question asked by the gentleman from Missouri, if the administration would take the broadest possible interpretation of the act, can it not do a great deal under the vocational rehabilitation, by constructive work, for the so-called crippled and disabled?

Mr. COOPER. That is true.
Mr. MILLER. May I add a further thought. The worst thing that could happen is to tell a person who is crippled that he is on the shelf for life. I would rather spend $10 to rehabilitate that man than to pay him a pension of $10 and retire him.

Mr. COOPER. That is true. The gentleman will remember that this is a State program. It is a State-administered program. The Federal Government makes grants-in-aid to the States to carry forward the rehabilitation program. We are increasing the amount of money or the authorization by the Federal Government to the extent of a million dollars in the pending bill.

Mr. MILLER. In some States there seems to be a misunderstanding as to what rehabilitation of the disabled means, and some of the money expended in the States, it has been ruled by the Board, is not rehabilitation. I realize it cannot be included in the act.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman knows that Congress cannot enact a law and administer it too, but we are including a provision to enable the States to give greater assistance along that line.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the States fully comply to the limit and go along with the million dollars to which the gentleman has referred, what will the total sum amount to? Can the gentleman give us that figure? Suppose the States fully comply.

Mr. COOPER. I cannot give the gentleman the amount to the penny.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Roughly.

Mr. COOPER. We are appropriating $1,900,000, approximately, at the present time. This bill increases it by a million dollars, which will make very close to $3,000,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the gentleman know what the States are contributing with reference to the $1,900,000?

Mr. COOPER. I do not have those figures before me. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], who has been vitally interested in this matter for many years, made a very able speech day before yesterday on that particular subject.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I think if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Crawford] will refer to page 31 of the report, he will get the entire answer to his question.

Mr. COOPER. In this connection permit me to say I really believe the report presented by this committee on the pending bill is one of the best I have ever seen since it has been my privilege to serve here. I think it would be to the interest of every Member to study and preserve the report. We have labored for a long time to try to make it as complete as possible, and I think we have made considerable contribution along that line. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachu-

Mr. TREADWAY. I assume that the gentleman is speaking of both parts of the report, including the minority views?

Mr. COOPER. I am glad to include the entire report, both the report accompanying the bill and the minority views filed with it.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, as I was trying to point out a few moments ago, it was realized at the time the Social Security Act was passed that changes and amendments would have to be made in the future. When you are dealing with a program as far-reaching and as important as this, it is humanly impossible to bring about that degree of perfection in the drafting of legislation of this type that we may be encouraged to believe will withstand all possible future tests. So it was recognized at the time the Social Security Act was passed that changes would be found necessary, and the provision is included in the present act providing that the Social Security Board shall continue to study, make investigations, and report to Congress its recommendations for changes and improvements in the act in the light of its experience.

Last year an advisory council was appointed, composed of many of the outstanding men of this Nation, men like Mr. Swope, of General Electric; the head of United States Steel; Mr. Fuller, of the Curtis Publishing Co.; and many other outstanding industrialists of the Nation; also outstanding labor leaders of the country, including Mr. Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor; a representative of the C. I. O.; and other outstanding representatives of the workers of the country; and a very distinguished group of outstanding men who represented the general public, including Dr. Brown, of Princeton University, who served as chairman of the group.

Then the Social Security Board made its report and the President of the United States transmitted this report to the Congress. The report of the Advisory Council and the Social Security Board was the basis upon which your committee worked out the amendments which are presented to you in this pending bill.

Full and complete hearings were held on this subject. Forty-eight days of time was devoted to those public hearings. They began on February 1 and closed on April 7. Twentyfive hundred pages of testimony are included in the printed hearings. One hundred and sixty-four witnesses appeared during that time. The committee devoted 6 weeks of almost solid time in executive session to preparing the pending bill after the public hearings were closed. This bill embraces the amendments to the present Social Security Act.

If I may have your indulgence for a few moments longer, I would like to take up and endeavor to discuss a little more in detail some of the outstanding amendments included in this bill and changes made in the present Social Security Act. First, I should like to invite your attention to the matter of taxes. This bill affords more tax relief to the people of this country than we can hope to give them in any other measure that can be enacted by this session of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachu-

Mr. McCORMACK. In connection with the recommendations of the Advisory Council, William Randolph Hearst appointed a committee to make an investigation, called the Nonpartisan Social Security Commission, consisting of Senator James J. Davis, Henry I. Harriman, Samuel W. Reyburn, William J. Graham, Dr. Herman Feldman, Dr. Richard A. Lester, and Merryle Stanley Rukeyser. Their recommendations, as far as contributory annuities are concerned, are substantially along the lines of the recommendations of the Advisory Council and along the lines of the present bill as this committee has reported it.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct.

If I may refer at this time to an additional item, we have heard considerable discussion about the old-age insurance reserve fund. We have heard some words used that I regret to hear used in connection with it, with respect to its being a system involving the use of I O U's, and so on like that. The Social Security Act, the law passed by Congress, requires that these special obligations shall yield 3 percent interest for this fund. Of course, the money coming in from the payroll taxes is to be invested in these special obligations. The Treasury Department has followed the word and the letter of the law in that respect. This Advisory Council, composed of some of the outstanding men in the Nation, included as a part of their report a description of the use of this fund, and I wish to read two short sentences from the report:

The United States Treasury uses the moneys realized from the issuance of these special securities by the old-age reserve account in the same manner as it does moneys realized from the sale of other Government securities.

This matter has been handled the same as all other funds of a similar type and character. The retirement fund for civil-service employees and the fund for the soldiers' insurance, as well as various other funds, have been handled in exactly the same way, under administrations of both political parties, as has this fund for old-age insurance.

I invite your attention to the closing sentence of this report:

The members of the council-

This is the Advisory Council-regardless of differing views on other aspects of the financing of old-age insurance, are of the opinion that the present provisions regarding the investment of the moneys in the old-age reserve account do not involve any misuse of these moneys or endanger the safety of these funds.

As I indicated a moment ago, I should like to invite your attention briefly to the provisions of this bill with respect to taxes. During the year 1940 the people of this country will pay about $580,000,000 less in taxes than they would have to pay under the present act.

For the ensuing 2 years they will pay about $1,130,000,000 less in taxes than they would have to pay under the present act. The total savings will amount to approximately $1,710,000,000.

The old-age insurance tax has been frozen at 1 percent on the worker and 1 percent on the employer for the 3 years 1940, 1941, and 1942, as against the 11/2-percent rate on each employer and employee under the present act. This will save employers and workers about $275,000,000 in 1940, or a total of about $825,000,000 in the 3 years.

Provision is made so the States may reduce their unemployment insurance contributions, if a certain reserve fund has been attained and minimum benefit standards have been provided. All except about five States of the Union will be able to take advantage of this change during 1940. This may save employers from $200,000,000 to $250,000,000 during 1940 if the States reduce their contribution rates from an average of 2.7 percent to an average of 2 percent.

Only the first $3,000 an employer pays an employee per year is taxed under the unemployment compensation provision. This is already true in the case of old-age insurance. This will save employers about $65,000,000 a year.

Provision is also made for refunds and abatements to employers who paid their 1936 and 1937 and 1938 unemployment compensation contributions late to the States. This will save employers about $15,000,000.

Therefore, the aggregate of these items, as I indicated a moment ago, will amount to a saving to the taxpayers of the country of about $580,000,000 during the year 1940, and for the next 3 years a total saving of about $1,710,000,000. This is much more substantial tax relief than we can possibly hope to give to the people of this country under any other legislation that we can pass at this session of the Congress.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I appreciate what the gentleman says, and I think it is a very fine showing. I wonder if the gentleman is going to show in his speech how much wider we have made the distribution. If the gentleman does not have the time or is not going to do so, I may say that I have not been able to find that set out by itself in the report, and I believe it would be a very fine thing if it were stated, if the gentleman has such information. It would not, of course, be fair to tell this House you are going to save that much money, because we are going to spread it out over a wider base and spend a great deal more than we are going to spend.

Mr. COOPER. Of course, you have to spend more money, especially for old-age insurance during the earlier years of the program, but we will save money in the later years, so that over a period of 40 or 45 years it is estimated it will come out about the same as the present program would cost us.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachu-

Mr. HOLMES. I understand the gentleman to say that the annual contribution on the part of the employee and employer has been fixed at 1 percent.

Mr. COOPER. Yes; that is true.
Mr. HOLMES. Has the gentleman any estimate of how much revenue that tax will bring into the Treasury?

Mr. COOPER. I do not have the figures immediately before me as to the yield of the present 1 percent, but by freezing at the present 1 percent and not allowing it to increase next year to 11/2 percent on employers and employees, the saving I have indicated of about $275,000,000 will be made by reason of not allowing the increase to go into effect.

Mr. HOLMES. I appreciate that and I am just wondering if the Treasury did not file with the committee the total amount of the yield during 1938 on that 1 percent basis.

Mr. COOPER. Oh, yes; those figures appear in the hearings. I just do not happen to have them immediately before me at the moment.

Mr. HOLMES. Are they in the report? Mr. COOPER. Yes; they are in the report, too.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman clear up the matter regarding the use of this pay-roll tax by the Government? The gentleman heard the gentleman from New York state that under the present system the Government is giving the Security Board its I O U's, and that when the time comes to pay these pensions it will mean that a tax will have to be levied again. Will the gentleman point out, if he can, wherein the statement of the gentleman from New York in that respect is incorrect?

Mr. COOPER. I endeavored to point out a few moments ago by quoting from the Advisory Council that this fund has been used just the same as all other similar funds handled by the Government, and that is true.

Now, let me further state to the gentleman, what practical difference does it make? These taxes are paid in by the employers and employees. The Government receives that money in the Treasury. The Government has certain expenditures to make and certain obligations to meet. What is the practical difference between levying a tax upon the people now to raise all the money that the Federal Government has to have or in using this money and paying interest on it; and if need be, levying taxes later to replace that money?

From a practical business standpoint I am unable to see how there is any ground for any great alarm or disturbance on that point.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman is asking me, I see a great deal of difference, but that was not my question.

Mr. COOPER. And this is not the proper time for us to get into a prolonged argument about that.

Mr. MOTT. The question I am asking the gentleman is whether or not the statement of the gentleman from New York is correct that we levy this money twice in order to pay these old-age pensions? We levy it once through the payroll tax, we spend that for general governmental purposes, and then we levy it again by general taxation. Is that correct or not?

Mr. COOPER. No; I do not think so. We levy this tax and we provide this fund and it is held by the Government.

Mr. MOTT. No; it is spent by the Government.

Mr. COOPER. Just a minute, if I may continue. We levy this tax, we collect this money, and it is held by the United States. Now, the United States Government uses that money just like it uses any other money, and issues its special obligations to this particular fund, and they are held in this fund. The fund is just as solvent; it is just as sound as the Government itself. Now, what is the difference between raising taxes or providing revenue in the future to take care of these special obligations than it would be for any other bond or obligation issued by the Government?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am very much interested in the gentleman's comment that the tax for 1936, 1937, and 1938 had been taken care of from some of those who paid their taxes to the State too late. It has come to my attention that this rather complicated legislation carried such heavy penalties as to work an injustice on certain taxpayers in its beginning years of operation. Some taxpayers at first paid, or offered to pay, too late and were themselves not to blame.

Mr. COOPER. Too late to get credit.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman found, did he not, that there were a great many that were in that predicament—men who were not at fault, but who had failed to synchronize these two laws, one law on the part of the Federal Government, and one on the part of the State, so that such taxpayers found themselves delinquent, so to speak, and under heavy penalty? I think the gentleman's committee has done wisely and acted justly in showing this proper attitude toward struggling businessmen. They want to do the right thing in paying these taxes and I congratulate the committee upon this fair provision.

Mr. COOPER. I appreciate the gentleman's statement. Of course it was shown to us that a considerable number of people had been caught in this kind of a situation. I have no doubt that many of them were worthy and deserving and there may have been some who were not quite so worthy and deserving, but we have given the relief, we have at least given them a fresh start, an opportunity to move along from this point.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. I think the gentleman is making a very learned discussion of this bill. There is one phase of it, however, that perhaps the gentleman has touched upon to some extent, but it is something I believe that all of us are much interested in, and that is the question of the wider distribution of old-age pensions. Will the gentleman explain to the House whether or not the new set-up is going to give a wider distribution of the funds either to cover families or old people in this country not covered at the present time?

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman have reference to oldage assistance in title I, commonly called old-age pensions, or does he refer to old-age benefits under title II, commonly referred to as old-age annuities?

Mr. BROOKS. Old-age pensions. That question has arisen and it has been discussed on the floor, but I have not heard a satisfactory answer up to the present time.

Mr. COOPER. Of course my time is almost exhausted and I cannot enter into a lengthy discussion of that at this time except to say that the pending bill continues the present arrangement whereby the Federal Government will match dollar for dollar what the State puts up for old-age pensions, except this does increase the limit from $15 to $20, or a total of from $30 to $40.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio rose.

Mr. COOPER. I am sorry, but I have only a little more time remaining and I was hoping to cover some other phases of the bill. We have liberalized considerably the provisions of the Social Security Act, especially with reference to oldage insurance, and we now include in this bill provisions for the wives of these annuitants, and we also make provision for children, also for widows and orphans. It has been considerably extended so as to take in this adidtional group of people so that we may in effect say that we now have under the provisions of this bill a program on a family basis, and we will take care of these people who will need this assistance because of the loss of the father or the husband and the loss of the pay and wages that he has been bringing into the family.

I would like to here show more in detail some of the additional benefits provided.

Your committee, after 4 months of hard work, has brought you a bill that we sincerely believe is in the interest of the people of this country and one that we feel is worthy of your support. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read by title rather than by sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the bill be read by title rather than by sections. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, as far as the minority is concerned, we are agreeable to reading the bill by title.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I make the inquiry just as a matter of information, because several people have come to the desk inquiring as to where they may offer their amendments. This is true, is it not, that the bill will be read from the first page over to title II, at the end of page 5, and anyone wishing to offer an amendment that is germane to any portion of the bill up to that place will be permitted to offer it at the conclusion of the reading of that portion of the bill, if he can get recognition from the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is entirely correct. The Clerk will read title I.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Social Security Act Amendments of 1939."

TITLE I-AMENDMENTS TO TITLE I OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT SEC. 101. Section 2 (a) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

read as follows:

"(a) A State plan for old-age assistance must (1) provide that it shall be in effect in all political subdivisions of the State, and, if administered by them, be mandatory upon them; (2) provide for financial participation by the State; (3) either provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to administer the plan, or provide for the establishment or designation of a single State agency to supervise the administration of the plan; (4) provide for granting to any individual, whose claim for old-age assistance is denied, an opportunity for a fair hearing before such State agency; (5) provide such methods of administration (other than those relating to selection, tenure of office, and compensation of personnel) as are found by the Board to be necessary for the proper and efficient operation of the plan; (6) provide that the State agency will make such reports, in such form and containing such information, as the Board may from time to time require, and comply with such provisions as the Board may from require, and comply with such provisions as the Board may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports; (7) effective July 1, 1941, provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance; and (8) effective July 1, 1941, provide safeguards which restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of old-age assistance."

SEC. 102. Effective January 1, 1940, section 3 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"PAYMENT TO STATES

"Sec. 3. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary "Sec. 3. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing January 1, 1940, (1) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, equal to one-half of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each needy individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not an immate of a public institution, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $40, and (2) 5 percent of such amount, which shall be used for paying the costs of administering the State plan or for old-age assistance, or both, and for no other purpose.

"(b) The method of computing and paying such amounts shall be as follows:

be as follows:

fied, increased by 5 percent."

SEC. 103. Section 6 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. When used in this title, the term 'old-age assistance' means money payments to needy aged individuals."

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Colmer: On page 3, line 9, strike out "one-half" and insert "four-fifths"; in line 15, strike out "40" and insert "25"; page 4, line 6, strike out "one-half" and insert "one-fifth."

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that we gave notice several days ago we were going to offer on this occasion. This is the amendment that has the backing of approximately 100 Members of this House who are sponsoring it. This is the amendment by which we hope to equalize the distribution of the proceeds to the aged needy of this country.

I placed in the Appendix of the RECORD, appearing at page 2490, under an extension of remarks, a chart which would show just what this amendment would mean in the average receipts by those qualified as recipients in each State. In other words, this amendment seeks to have the Federal Government pay four-fifths for every dollar that the State puts up to the Federal Government's limitation of $20. This would tend to equalize the distribution of these funds. It would tend to bring some of the poorer States up, but it would help every State in the Union, as this chart will disclose.

I know a lot has been said about helping the aged needy. I know there is a lot of lip service that is rendered to this class of people. I do not belong to any organization other than the organization that was formed here yesterday. I do not subscribe to any organization that goes cut and seeks money from the aged and needy-money which they needto try to put across this kind of legislation. I do not have any sympathy with a lot of that stuff that is done.

By this amendment you have an opportunity to render some real service rather than lip service to your constituents who are in need of these funds.

We are going to have a lot of debate about this, I assume. These gentlemen on the powerful Ways and Means Committee, for whom I have very profound respect and a high regard, are going to say that we are trying to wreck their bill, and so on. But this matter has been called to their attention before. I realize they have worked hard on this proposition, but I am not going to take all my time in paying tribute to the Ways and Means Committee, more than to say that I have a very high respect and regard for them.

But I do say to you, when they tell you this will wreck the Government and it is going to cost a whole lot of money, just remember this: As the able gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] has pointed out, if this amendment is adopted it will not cost the Federal Government one cent more than it would cost the Federal Government if the States match the $20 that the Ways and Means Committee has authorized them to pay in this bill. It is not going to wreck the Government. I voted against a proposition that was submitted recently, as a matter of discretion, because I thought it was going too far; but we have got something here that is tangible; something that is reasonable; something that can be attained. Those of you who are in favor of this amendment and who want to help these aged people, I hope, will say so by your vote on this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee contends that this amendment, if enacted, would cost the Federal Government more than fourhundred-odd-million dollars, and gives his authority therefor. We deny that it would cost anything like that amount, and we aver that the figures that we obtained from the same source are to the effect that it would cost only $114,000,000 upon the present basis of those who are qualified and are obtaining the pension. But, of course, we know that figures do not mean anything. The question is, Are we willing to adopt this amendment and let it go to the other end of the Capitol, where it would be amended, anyway; and as a result, have some tangible increase worked out in conference? Let me say to you that while we are primarily interested in the States in the lower brackets, this amendment would help aged recipients in every State of the Union, including the State of the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. It would mean, as we pointed out the other day, that the aged needy who qualify in the State of Mississippi would receive a pension of $18.05. We appeal to your sense of fairness and justice and urge you to support this amendment. [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer], and I appear here as one of the group that is sponsoring this amendment.

My State today is paying between $8 and $9 to its oldage pensioners. Offering the additional amount from the Federal Government, under the plan sponsored by the Ways and Means Committee, will not help their situation. They are not now able to match the $15 on a dollar-for-dollar basis. Therefore the plan of the committee does not offer any assistance to the State of Georgia.

According to the information I have, the situation we find ourselves in in Georgia is a situation similar to that of most of the States, in that they are not now matching the $15 which the present law provides. If the Ways and Means Committee is in good faith in offering this $20, and I think they are, then the plan we are proposing here today will not cost the Government any more money, simply because we are not increasing the amount that the Government offers to pay beyong the $20 stipulated in the pending bill. We simply change the ratio or proportion from dollar for dollar to 4 to 1. That will help all of the States. Every one of the 48 States of the Union will be able to pay more money to the old-age pensioners in their States, without increasing the cost to the States.

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BOEHNE. What assurance does this amendment give the aged needy that they will actually receive more in the State of Georgia or the State of Mississippi or in any other State in the Union than they are now receiving?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It gives them this assurance, that with the present appropriations, instead of getting between $8 and $9 they will get over $20.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. What is there in this amendment, though, to force this money to go to the old people instead of the State just taking this money and continuing to pay the old people what they are getting now?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, any State can refuse to appropriate any money for old-age pensions. They can do it under the committee's plan just as well as they can do it under this, but public sentiment will demand that they continue the present appropriations and take the benefit of additional money coming from the Federal Government, and that is the only way we are going to do anything under this type of legislation for the old people in our States.

I hope the committee will adopt this amendment. think it is a reasonable proposal, and I think it will benefit all of the States and enable us to enact a sound, sensible program, one that can be complied with and one that will be of real benefit to the people.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. The gentleman states that some States are not able to match 50-50

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Why are they not able to do that? Mr. RAMSPECK. Because they have not enough money. Mr. DWORSHAK. Where is the Federal Government going to get the money to pay the four-fifths instead of the half when it is now operating at an annual deficit of three or four billions of dollars?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The same place it gets it now.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Where is that?

Mr. RAMSPECK. By borrowing it and from taxes, that is where we get it now.

The point I am making is that even though the committee proposal says that the Federal contribution will be raised to $20, the old people will not get any more than they are getting now for it will be impossible for the States to match it.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. I think the gentleman has not thought this through. It will, of course, cost the Government more money. Under the Colmer amendment the Government would be called upon to pay a $20 pension to every qualified aged needy person in the country, but under the committee plan it will not cost the Government more, because the States must match.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Then the gentleman admits that his committee put that in the bill not in good faith.

Mr. BUCK. Not at all. The committee put it in the bill in the utmost good faith, liberalizing the present law, but following out the principle of the present law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. It was put in the bill with the expectation that the States could not take advantage of it?

Mr. BUCK. It was not.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Then the Colmer proposal will not cost any more than the committee proposal will. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, several bills in line with the Colmer amendment have been introduced in this House. I happen to be the author of one similar to it which had the approval of the great organization of which Abe Epstein is director and which has the approval of that organization and, as I understand, was endorsed by Mr. Epstein when he testified before the Committee on Ways and Means. In view of the fact that the bill that I have proposed is in line with the Colmer amendment, I wish to address my remarks to that amendment trather than to the legislation which I proposed.

In the first place, the proposal of the Ways and Means Committee on old-age help is unfair to the poorer States of the country. That is apparent. There is a disparity in the amounts that old people in the various States will receive. In addition to that particular disparity there is another one. Because of the difference in amounts, it forces the poorer States to pay from their meager funds a part of the cost of furnishing larger pensions to the richer States. These two disparities are so unfair that I believe they will be remedied by this House. It was suggested a few days ago by someone on this floor that there ought to be a disparity in old-age payments in the States because of differences in the cost of living in different sections of the country. The Wage and Hour Division of the Labor Department recently found as a fact that in certain cities or towns of around 5,000 or 10,000 population in the South and elsewhere over the country there was only a 2-percent differential. So much as to the unfairness of the bill as it now stands as to the poorer States.

I also maintain that the committee's proposal is unfair to the richer States, and for this reason: The poorer people, and especially the aged people, where low old-age payments are made will and do frequently gravitate to the richer States where larger amounts are paid. I know this is the fact.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. COLLINS. I have only a minute or two, I cannot yield. I know this is a fact, because in the last 5 or 6 years, according to a study made about a year ago by a certain group studying sociology at George Washington University in the District of Columbia, it was found that about 87,000 colored people had come to the District of Columbia and that this influx along with the other colored residents constitute 47.3 percent of the total votes of the District of Columbia if there were suffrage here. This shows that people in the small or no income brackets are moving to centers like Washington, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, and other cities of the United States to get relief or larger oldage assistance benefits. And these cities will necessarily have to further increase their budgets in order to care for these unfortunate people seeking a better existence.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am one of those benighted individuals who had the audacity to vote for the Townsend plan and I am perfectly willing to assume that responsibility. The same reasons that impelled me to vote for the Townsend plan compels me to vote against this amendment. In the discussions upon that bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], who is now smiling so vigorously, in opposing the same, stated to this House in substance, like the advance man who used to run ahead of Ringling Bros. circus, "Wait until our circus comes to town." He stated in his remarks to the House in opposition to that bill, "Wait until the social-security bill comes before the House. We are going to do something for the aged people of this country in that bill."

As a result of those discussions, propaganda was disseminated throughout the Nation having for its purpose the creation of an impression in the minds of the aged people that they might expect some additional benefits by way of increased old-age pensions as a result of proposed amendments to the Social Security Act and the aged people of this country have been led to believe that after voting down the Townsend plan the Ways and Means Committee is going to take care of the aged by increasing the Federal contribution to the States who pay old-age pensions.

While I intend to vote for the present bill, I do not do so under any misapprehension that the proposed increase of Federal contribution from $15 to $20 is going to have the effect of materially increasing the pensions received by the aged throughout the country, and any propaganda that has been issued which tends to create this impression, in my judgment, is exceedingly vicious. The simple facts are that under the present law the Federal Government undertakes to match State money up to $15 per month for the payment of old-age pensions, so that if the various States were able to pay $15 per month to needy aged people, $30 per month pensions could thus be received.

The present bill proposes to increase the Federal Government's contribution from $15 per month to $20 per month, thus giving the impression that $40 per month pensions are to be made available to the aged. No such cruel hope should be aroused in the minds of the aged people of this country, for while it is possible for $40 pensions to be paid under the for while it is possible for $40 pensions to be paid under the present bill, the States, in order to pay $40 per month pensions, must pay one-half thereof, or $20, themselves.

I ask, therefore, in view of the facts that the records disclose that practically no State has availed itself up to date of the opportunity to receive even $15 per month, as provided in the present law, by matching that amount through the medium of a State contribution, how can it be expected that the States will be able to raise any more money to meet their share of the pension by raising the offer of the Federal Government from $15 to $20 per month? If the States are unable to match $15 per month, under the present law, and pay $30 per month pensions, certainly they will not be able to match $20 per month, so as to be able to pay $40 per month pensions. It is true that the opportunity is provided in the present bill, but aged people of this country should know and understand that the Federal Government under this proposed bill will not pay out a single dollar that is not matched by a similar dollar to be paid by the respective States, and I can see no hope or expectation of any increase in pensions if dependence is to be had upon the various States to provide the matching funds in order to make increased pensions available.

I have always contended, and still contend, that the whole subject of old-age pensions is Federal in character and scope, and that whatever pensions are paid should be paid directly out of the Federal Treasury, and the amount necessary to make such payments be provided for by suitable tax legislation on a pay-as-you-go basis. Any other program will have no other result than to see 48 different State pension schemes and plans buffeted about as political footballs while the aged people must stand on the side lines and continue to suffer because of improper and inadequate care.

It seems to me that any pension plan that is proposed should be sound enough and appealing enough to the public of America to permit the imposition of sufficient taxes to pay the cost. And any other program which relies upon a continuation of borrowed money is, in my judgment, indeed a hoax upon all of the people of this country. The aged people of this country, therefore, should not be encouraged in the thought that so-called liberalization of the old-age benefit provisions of the Social Security Act are going to result in any increased pension for them. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I yield to no man in my respect for the Ways and Means Committee of this House and for the distinguished and able gentlemen who compose it. My respect is unbounded also for the experts that great committee has associated with it in its labors. But I am convinced that in writing the old-age pension provisions of the original act, as well as of this bill. Jupiter has nodded.

In the bitter winter of 1788 Queen Marie Antoinette of France was told by one of her courtiers in reply to her question, "Why do the people cry?" "They cry for bread." Her classic response was, "Then let them eat cake."

History tells us that that witticism was one of the causes of the French Revolution and her start on the path to the guillotine.

The parallel may not be perfect, but it is sufficiently so, I think, to warrant its use as an argument for supporting the pending meritorious amendment. The needy aged of America who live in those States which are too bitterly poor to match Federal funds to any appreciable extent, are almost literally crying for bread. The answer of the Ways and Means Committee is, "Then let them eat cake."

Why increase this limit of Federal contribution to $20 when only one State has matched $15? If that cruel, false hope that you engendered by the original act and the State plans presented under it has failed of fruition in 47 States in the Union, and so miserably in 8 States that not one of them has been able to provide their half of even a $10 monthly pension, why do you call this an improvement when you merely raise the outside limit to which their false hope might point?

Mr. Chairman, we are not here arraying class against class, nor State against State. We are simply trying to face facts and those facts are that it is just as impossible for Alabama, for instance, to raise the $27,000,000 which would be required to match the Federal contribution up to $15 for every old person in our State as it is for an ordinary cow to jump over the moon.

The distinguished Secretary of Commerce, then W. P. A. Administrator, when he made his speech at Memphis about what he was going to do for the farmers of the Nation in their off season, after the crops were laid by, through W. P. A. work relief, was suffering from the same illusion that has actuated the Ways and Means Committee in the presentation of this bill. Neither he nor they can believe how poor many States and citizens are. The honorable Administrator thought there could not be more than 100,000 farmers in the Nation whose annual incomes were less than $312. That was his first total allotment—100,000. In spite of all the restrictions that could be devised, 100,000 was not sufficient for one State. In my home county I think more than 5,000 farmers qualified, but only 300 jobs were provided for them.

As it was in that promised farm relief, so is it with old-age pensions. The promise was not opulence, but the actuality is pathetic.

Whether we should ever have created this hope is debatable. But, having done so, the Nation's duty is clear. We must keep faith with those needy aged whom we taught to hope. They cannot eat hope. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I shall support this amendment. I have never been able to understand why the domicile or the residence of an old man or woman should be a test as to how much money he or she should receive from the Federal Government in payment of an old-age pension. I have always been impressed with the thought that when the Federal Government admitted that it owed an obligation to the old men and women of the United States, in fairness the Federal Government owed exactly the same amount of money to every old man and woman regardless of their geographic location within the United States.

Now, has the Federal Government recognized and admitted the fact that they owe an old-age pension to the old men and women of this country? The answer must inevitably be "yes." My distinguished, able, and respected colleague from Oklahoma made a very enlightening speech yesterday in which he pointed out that the thing we voted on when we voted several days ago on the Townsend plan was a test of whether or not the Federal Government should bear the entire burden of paying an old-age pension. I differ with my friend because that was not the test at all. If the State of Oklahoma can pay her old men and women a pension of any amount of money that is a State obligation.

If any State in the Union wants to pay its aged any sum of money, that is the privilege of the State and it is a State obligation. As I see it, this is a Federal matter. If the Federal Government is going to put it upon the basis that an old man or woman must live in a rich State before he or she can receive as much money as another old man or woman in exactly the same circumstances, then, insofar as the Federal Government is concerned, it is discriminating between the old man or the old woman who lives in Mississippi, for example, and the old man or the old woman in exactly the same situation who lives in the State of New York.

This is the closest approach I have seen to the Federal Government paying an equal amount of money to old men and women who fall into a certain class no matter what State they live in. The only reason it is a close approach is that if this amendment is adopted then any State which can raise $5 for the old men and women entitled to a pension would receive $20 from the Federal Government. When the Committee on Ways and Means says, "We will match up to $20 the money appropriated by the States," it is saying, "We assume that the Federal Government has a responsibility of $20 per month to every old man and woman in the United States."

I am tired of hearing candidates for office prate about the great things that will be done for the aged of this country.

I am tired of seeing this body year after year hold out hope to the aged of this country that some day the Federal Government will adequately take care of them.

I could not support the Townsend plan because it held out a promise to the old people of this country which I knew could never be fulfilled, to wit, the payment of $200 per month to every old man and woman in the United States over 65 years of age; and the Ways and Means Committee said they were bringing out a bill which would liberalize old-age pensions and adequately fulfill the Federal obligation. They have broken faith with us.

The plan offered here today by the great Ways and Means Committee of this House is but little better than the Townsend plan, because it holds out to the old people of this Nation the hope that under the provisions of this bill they will receive $40 a month. The real truth of the matter is that they can only receive this sum if and when the State wherein they live appropriates enough money to pay them $20 a month from the State, in which event the Federal Government will match it with $20.

Let us look at the record. Ten dollars a month is the average paid in old-age pensions all over the United States, being represented by $5 from the State and $5 from the Federal Government. Only one State in the United States is paying $15 a month, and by so doing availing themselves of the $15 contribution of the Federal Government. That State is California.

Why, then, should we believe that the States of the Union will now supply $20 when under the old law they could not even supply $15?

No; this bill is but an idle gesture, and unless this Colmer amendment, or some amendment like it, is adopted, we will simply fix it so that the rich States of the Union, such as New York, California, and other States of their kind, will benefit because their resources will permit the appropriation of sufficient sums to avail themselves of the $20 Federal contribution while the old people in States, such as Oklahoma, Alabama, Mississippi, and nearly every State in the South and Southwest, will continue to suffer because the resources of those States are not such that the legislature can appropriate a sufficient amount of money to match 50-50 the maximum amount provided in this bill.

Why do not we be honest and fair with the old pioneers who gave us civilization, culture, and the good things of life which we enjoy today, and say to them the Federal Government will pay you X amount of dollars as its contribution to your support in your declining years, through appreciation for services rendered, and they pay that amount to every old man and woman who falls within the classification, regardless of where he or she may live, and then if the State in which they live deems that that State owes them an additional sum, then let the State legislature appropriate that sum and pay it to them direct and independent of the sum paid by the Federal Government.

When I voted for the Social Security bill when it was first offered for consideration, I said that I was doing so not because I thought it was ample or sufficient, but because I found myself in the position of a man who found himself caught naked in a blizzard and someone handed him a suit of B. V. D.'s and he put them on, not because he thought they would keep him from freezing to death, but because he thought it was the best that was offered.

If this amendment is defeated and there is not one similar to it adopted, my conscience dictates to me that I should vote against this bill and that I would do were it not for the fact that I am afraid that the old people of my congressional district would misinterpret the vote and think that I was voting against the principle of the payment of an old-age pension, so I presume that in the end I shall have to vote for the passage of whatever bill is finally agreed to by the House, finding myself again in the position of a man in a blizzard.

This is the first real opportunity that the Members of the House of Representatives have had to closely approach discharging the Nation's obligation to our aged. Support this amendment. Let us incorporate it in this bill. Then we can all go home tonight, sleep well, secure in the belief that we have taken a long step forward toward discharging this obligation, and we can surely rest assured that we are no longer kidding the old people of the country, but at last have decided to play fair. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, this amendment is madness, sheer madness, when we begin to reason it out. The Social Security Board estimates that this will cost $417,000,000 annually, this statement being made by the Chairman of the Board to me here this morning.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. COLMER. What is the name of the gentleman who made that statement?

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Altmeyer, the Chairman of the Social Security Board.

This amendment will cost $417,000,000 annually; and you will know it yourselves when you reason it out, and so will the author of the amendment.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DISNEY. No; I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just one brief question?

Mr. DISNEY. I yield.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What did the Social Security Board estimate would be the cost of providing $20 a month under this bill if all the States matched that contribution?

Mr. DISNEY. I did not inquire about that. That is not involved.

Mr. Chairman, let us be practical for a moment. Suppose we were members of the Mississippi Legislature and this amendment should pass here today. We would promptly go into session and raise the State contribution to $5 from whatever it is now-I believe it is something over $4. You say now you cannot afford to raise the State contribution, yet if this amendment were agreed to you could afford to go to $5, because for every $5 you contributed you would bring $20 of Federal money into the State. You would figure the additional expenditure under the same theories advanced here; would justify your raising the contribution to what you say now you cannot afford. You would have put up $5 to get $20 into the State. What else would you do? You would liberalize the needs test until you would get more twenties and more and more until you would gut the Federal Treasury. That is what would happen.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

yield?

Mr. DISNEY. I cannot yield.

Then let us go to the State of Oklahoma and imagine you are a legislator in that State, which now contributes about $9. A legislator with enough sense to come in out of the rain would vote to cut the contribution to $5, because now the oldage pensioners in the State get only about $18 when we put up $9 and by contributing $5 you would get a total of $25 a month for the old-age pensioners in the State. Then you in Oklahoma would liberalize the needs test to get more and more twenties from the Federal Government. Why would it not cost $417,000,000? The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] and I discussed it last night, and reasoning that the probability would be that because of the liberalizing of the needs test, which would naturally follow if this amendment is adopted, the number of pensioners would go up and up, if State legislators would act as we would appear to be acting if we passed such an amendment, it would come more nearly approaching a billion dollars than $417,000,000.

Gentlemen, let me plead with you. In 1916 the Federal Government in this United States cost $1,034,000,000, and in 1939, without any comparable increase in population, we are going to spend ten billion. How long can it last? How long are we going to continue at this rate? We cannot afford it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DISNEY. Not now.

It is said that the State of Alabama just cannot raise the money. How long are we going to continue? Why, the psychology in the Hoover administration got so low that Government obligations were selling in the 80's, and now Governments are oversubscribed 10 or 15 times. What a turn of the hand it would take to change that intangible thing, that psychology, into the psychology of those other terrible times. If we try to keep this up, we just cannot afford to do it. [Applause]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

The gentleman who just preceded me said that the amendment is sheer madness. I think there are very few people in this House this afternoon who will not take issue with that statement. I may call attention to the fact that the people in my State today are only receiving around $8 per month at the age of 65 years and above, and they are limited to cases of absolute necessity. It is not a wide-open proposition where people generally who have reached that age and have a very meager income can even get any assistance. They have to submit proof that they are on starvation and have no relatives that can assist them before they are even recognized for any assistance, and even then there are a great many persons on the waiting list who are unable to get their $8 a month now.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman would not abolish the needs

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I would make it more liberal and would certainly eliminate the pauper's oath.

Mr. DISNEY. That is exactly what your legislature would do if you ever passed this amendment.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I think they should do it. I think it is only fair to the people of this country that we should increase and liberalize this pension. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. If they should do that, why do they not do it now?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. The trouble is a great many States, including my own, are financially unable to put up the $4 for the ones who are on the rolls today.

Mr. DOUGHTON. If they cannot put up $4, how can they put up $5, as proposed in this amendment?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Of course, if this amendment is adopted and they only put up the $4 which they are doing at the present time, then the Government, under this amendment, would put up $16, and that would enable them to receive a total of $20 a month. A great many of the aged people in my State would be most happy to receive that amount a month instead of the meager sum of $8 which they now receive under the present Federal and State laws.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Of course, my colleague does not understand-and I am sure the gentlemen who have questioned him do not understand-that it would be necessary to put up any fixed amount for them to receive an increase under this amendment. If they put up $2, under this amendment they would be entitled to $10.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. That is right.

Mr. COLMER. And the amount goes up on a graduated scale to where the aged needy in the gentleman's State of Oklahoma would receive an increase of approximately $10.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. That is right, and I call my colleague's attention to page 2490 of the Appendix to the Con-GRESSIONAL RECORD. At that page of the RECORD you will find a table inserted by my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer]. The information contained therein was furnished by the Social Security Board, and, speaking for the State of Oklahoma, we find that the aged in that State received an average pension for the month of April of $19.79, and if this amendment should be adopted they would receive an increase up to $29.90. Take the State of Connecticut. The aged there received for April $25.88, whereas if this amendment should be adopted they would receive $32.94 without any further action on the part of the State legislatures of those respective States. Then take California, the only State of the Union that is matching the $15 under the present law, there they would receive about $37 if this amendment should be adopted.

The law we have today requiring the State to match dollar for dollar is nothing in the world but a farce, because the agricultural States and the poorer States of this Union are unable financially to put up on a dollar-for-dollar basis.

We have in my State every kind of tax imaginable, and those taxes do not yield enough to match the Federal funds under the present law. The Federal Government is committed to this proposition and this Congress should liberalize this bill whereby the aged living in the poor States will be put on an equal basis with the ones living in the rich States. I hope the proposed amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 25 minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object-

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 1 hour.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment close in 1 hour.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to make it one hour and a half.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that debate close in one hour and

The amendment to the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that all debate on this amendment close in 1 hour.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'Connor) there were—ayes 147, noes 44.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I think we find ourselves in a rather anomalous position at the present time, and one which cannot be sustained. In the first place, under the present act, as I understand it, something like one-third of the people of the United States engaged in remunerative employment are covered for old-age benefits. In order to support those payments, there is a 1-percent tax paid upon their wages by themselves, and 1-percent tax paid by the employer. The people who drafted the bill choose to call it an excise tax, or something of that sort, to get away from the expression, a gross-income tax. However, it is, nevertheless, a tax on the gross income of those who earn the wages. It is said that the first 1 percent only can be so considered. but I call attention to the fact that in all probability the additional 1 percent paid by the employer can be considered as a 1-percent increase in salary, and then deducted from their total wages. The other day some of us stood some rather vituperative talk on the part of the members of the committee and others because we voted for the Townsend bill. I am not an adherent of the Townsend plan-in fact, the Townsend people not only did not endorse me, they put a candidate in the field against me; but I voted for that bill partly because of the following particular reason: It supplies a tax to support the payment of benefits. I have gone into this bill before us, and I find that the old-age assistance program under the Social Security Act has no basis of tax to support it whatever, and I believe that the committee missed a big bet, a splendid opportunity, to go into that other bill, and place a tax on the books, not only by consent of, but by the strong urging of these groups, in order to support the old-age assistance program. I think they missed a big opportunity, and I said at the time that if the committee had exercised its collective genius and considered that measure in committee and perfected it, they could have had a tax to support that old-age assistance program. At the present time there is talk also in this House about increasing the benefits to certain aged people, and some Members are hollering because there is no tax to support it. I think the committee made a big mistake in not taking on that proposed tax, or something

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer] talks about the wealthier States. The State of California is not any wealthier than any other State, and if you will increase the payments to the people in your own States and keep them out of our State, then the people paying the $20 tax in California will be so much better off and better able to support the aged people we have now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes; I yield. Mr. RANKIN. This amendment would be a relief to the State of California?

Mr. HINSHAW. It would in a way, but some such plan as the one brought up the other day would be a much greater

Mr. RANKIN. I am not criticizing the gentleman's attitude the other day, but his attitude today would load this burden onto the people of California and not tend to relieve them.

Mr. HINSHAW. Of the $20 contributed by the people of California, $10 is paid by the real-estate taxpayers, largely home owners and farmers, and $10 comes out of the State general taxation. It is a burden greater than our people can afford, and the Social Security Act to that extent is ruining our State.

Mr. RANKIN. The present act?

Mr. HINSHAW. The old-age assistance program and some other features.

Mr. RANKIN. And the present bill without this amendment is not helping the State of California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Not at all, insofar as old-age assistance is concerned.

Mr. RANKIN. This amendment would help the State of California?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes; by encouraging the aged in other States to stay home.

Mr. RANKIN. Then the gentleman is for the amend-

Mr. HINSHAW. I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Johnson] for 2 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pending Colmer amendment. Let me say in the outset that I regret to find myself in disagreement at this time with my able and distinguished colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY], for whom I have much respect. The fact is that I was rather surprised and somewhat disappointed that he should refer to this amendment as sheer madness. I do not believe that my colleague really intended to use such strong language. When the vote is taken it is my guess that at least seven, or possibly eight of the nine Members of Congress from Oklahoma will support the Colmer amendment as the most practical and humane proposal yet presented. Oh, no, this is not sheer madness, but it proposes a long-delayed justice to our deserving and impoverished old people. [Applause.]

The pending amendment not only would liberalize the Federal Government's contribution but it proposes also to more nearly equalize the benefits to our old people, irrespective of where they may happen to reside. When the Social Security Act was first considered and debated in this body I took the position that a uniform Federal pension should be paid all old people who could qualify under the act, regardless of whether they resided in a wealthy State or a poor one. I have not changed my position.

Mention has been made several times today of the overwhelming defeat in this House recently of the so-called Townsend bill. Many of us recall the speech of the able chairman of the committee when the late Townsend bill was under consideration. I was much impressed with the statement of the chairman that it was the rankest kind of hypocrisy for anyone to lead our old people to believe that there was the remotest possibility of them receiving a Federal pension of $200 a month. To that statement I fully agreed.

Yet it is significant that the Ways and Means Committee has brought in a bill here proposing to raise the Federal contribution to $20 a month, when every Member knows full well that it will be impossible for a vast majority of the States to match such a proposal on a 50-50 basis. It is conceded that as the bill stands now, it is a gesture. shall not call that provision "sheer madness." Nor will I refer to such action on the part of this great committee as rank hypocrisy. But certainly I am not unduly critical when I say that such action by the committee is, at best, but an empty gesture. This amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer], as has heretofore been pointed out, simply proposes to assist the so-called poorer States which are absolutely unable to match the Federal Government even under the present law. This will do more to help the aged and take care of the old people now in dire distress than any other proposal yet made. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am supporting the so-called Colmer amendment, believing it to be a just and forward step in solving the perplexing problem of assistance to our deserving and needy old people. The announcement of the committee that it has raised Federal participation from $15 to $20 per month would seem at first blush to be important liberalization of the present law, but it is conceded that not more than six States in the Union would find it possible to pay a $40 pension on a 50-50 basis at this time. This act on the part of the Ways and Means Committee, instead of helping our aged people generally, would have the effect of working a hardship on them. Especially is this true in States like Oklahoma and 46 or 47 others that to date have not been able to match the Federal Government's participation of $15. It is doubtful if this gesture on the part of the Ways and Means Committee would add one dollar of Federal participation.

Under the Colmer amendment it is proposed that the Federal Government pay four-fifths of pensions to all people qualifying who have reached the age of 65 years, up to $20, which is the maximum amount of Federal participation recommended by the Ways and Means Committee. The wealthier States that desire and are able to pay more could, of course, do so. In fact, there is no limit to the amount that the State might pay. The State of Oklahoma, so I am advised, is at this time paying an average of about $9 per month. That would mean, if the Colmer amendment were adopted, that the average old-age pension would be $29 per month. Surely no one will rise in his seat and say any old person can live decently on less. This amendment should be adopted. If agreed to, it would not only make the lives of our deserving old people much easier but it would have the effect of eliminating some pension rackets of those who are chasing rainbows with impossible and fantastic dreams. It would ring down the curtain on those who are playing on the heartstrings of our old people and robbing them of nickels, dimes, and quarters that are needed for food.

Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment that I am vitally interested in. That is one that will be offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Voornis] to specify with a yardstick the "needs clause" for old-age pensions. One of the most unsatisfactory things connected with the administering of the Social Security Act has been the different yardsticks used in different localities.

An old person who works and makes an effort to earn a few dollars is penalized under the present system. The present set-up is not encouraging industry and thrift, but on the other hand it is very definitely encouraging idleness. I do not profess to know what the yardstick should be. The amendment of the gentleman from California simply proposes that those having an income of $360 or less will be able to participate in old-age pensions. I do not know whether that is the correct figure or not but certainly it is the duty of the Federal Government to place a limit somewhere. Of course it is nonsense and absurd to say that a person with a ten thousand or a hundred thousand dollar income should receive old-age benefits from the Government. But on the other hand, it is just as absurd to deprive a needy old person of a pension to which he is justly entitled because he makes a few dollars a week or month in an effort to help himself and his aged and perhaps helpless spouse. Certainly it should not be the policy of this Government to make anyone sign a pauper's oath in order to become a beneficiary of oldage assistance.

Again I say that this or a similar amendment ought, by all means, be adopted. But it seems that the die is cast, and that word has gone down the line to defeat any and all amendments. If such a program is carried out and this Congress adjourns without liberalizing and more evenly equalizing old-age pensions, I do not hesitate to predict that the people will elect a Congress that will enact just, reasonable, and humane legislation for the needy and deserving old people of the Nation. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY] for 2 minutes.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, there are two approaches to the subject of old-age pensions. It appears the Ways and Means Committee has approached it with the viewpoint of the monetary cost. There is the other approach, and that is as to what poverty is doing to American citizens. That is the primary approach. I am frank to say to you that the nearer we come in this Congress to making the pension program, whatever the amount may be, a strictly Federal program, the nearer we will come to ultimate justice toward the senior people of this country. [Applause.]

Of course, if the States of the Union all met this matching, under the present amendment it would cost more money than it is costing now, but I am satisfied, and the members of the Ways and Means Committee would have to grant that they knew when they offered this bill that no possibility existed for the various States to match to $20 per person.

I secured figures yesterday from the Social Security Board—there are 1,836,636 persons now on old-age assistance, and the cost to the Federal Government to pay each one $20 from Federal funds would cost $440,793,000, or just a little more than double what it is now. But that would be offset by probably an equal amount on W. P. A. appropriations or appropriations of that type. What is more, it would go just a little further along the line of doing justice to people who have been shamefully treated by this Congress ever since the depression began in 1929. I am heartsick when I note what needs to be done in fairness to our senior citizens, and when I see how ungrateful we are as a nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Rankin] for 2 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment to have the Federal Government pay a larger portion of the old-age pension should be adopted by all means. Personally, I should like to see the Federal Government pay it all, for I realize that the poorer States are unable to meet their part of the responsibility.

If the Congress is unwilling to have the Federal Government pay the entire amount of $30 per month, then by all means we should support the amendment to have the Federal Government pay two-thirds, or three-fourths of the amount while the State pays the balance—or let the Federal Government pay its part, $15 a month, regardless of State contribution.

The provisions of the present bill, without such an amendment, is worse than useless, so far as the vast majority of the old people of this country are concerned. To raise the amount from $30 per month to $40 per month and still require the States to pay 50 percent of it will be worth absolutely nothing to the old people in a majority of the agricultural States. The only thing they will get out of it will be the privilege of helping to pay their pro rata of that part of this pension contributed by the Federal Government to old people in the wealthier States.

There is only one State in the Union now that pays the full amount of $30 per month, and that is California. For the information of the House and others who read the Record I insert at this point a table showing the amount of old-age pension received by the old people of the various States under the present law.

You will note that the agricultural States that have been burdened for 75 years with a high protective tariff that levies a tax upon everything the people buy are unable to meet even the present limit of $15 a month. It is simply an outrage to pay the old people of some States $15 out of the Federal Treasury and at the same time pay the old people of Mississippi only $3.46, merely because the people of that State cannot match a higher figure.

These States that pay exorbitant freight rates now imposed for the benefit of the richer States, into whose coffers the wealth of the Nation has been poured by high tariffs, discriminatory freight rates, and utility rates, exorbitant interest rates and insurance charges—these poorer States supported usually by the toiling farmers of the Nation, are unable to meet their half of this $30 per month.

Therefore their old people, who toil in the fields and in the factories, and who struggle along in small business establishments, are shunted off with small amounts ranging as low as $6.92 a month in the State of Mississippi, or $6.15 a month in the State of Arkansas.

Yet that part of the Federal Government's contribution to the richer States is taken from the people of the poorer States through these indirect and hidden taxes.

I have always favored an old-age pension, but I believe it should be paid by the Federal Government, so that the people in every State would be treated alike.

Let me call attention to the fact that the social-security law as it now stands is of no benefit to the farmers of this country—the agricultural people who make the living for the rest of us, as a rule, get nothing out of it. This bill not only does not take care of them but it further penalizes the people in the agricultural States. If this amendment is adopted to raise the Federal Government's contribution to two-thirds or three-fourths, it will give them some relief and will not hurt the rest of you. I cannot understand why you men object to relieving a burden on the people of your States for fear we will do at least partial, if belated, justice to the people in the agricultural States.

This bill in its present form will not pass the Senate. The Senators from the agricultural States are not going to let it pass. If this is merely a gesture to kill off help for the old people throughout the agricultural belt, get up here and say so and let us fight it out on that ground. But if it is done by subterfuge, then the old people may say, in the words of Shakespeare:

And be these juggling "men" no more believed That palter with us in a double sense; That keep the word of promise to our ear, And break it to our hope.

They promised us just the other day that they would bring in a bill to correct the injustices in the old-age pension law. Now what have they brought in? A measure that at very best will only increase the old-age pensions in those States where they do not need it, keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. Our old people asked for a fish and you offered them a serpent; they asked for bread and you offered them a stone. They asked for a change that will help to keep the wolf from the door and you bring them one that will further penalize the old people in a majority of the States and only benefit a few in those States that are already well cared for.

The present social-security law, as I pointed out, leaves out the farmer entirely except as he may be permitted to participate in these old-age pension provisions which so violently discriminate against the agricultural States.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RANKIN. Yes

Mr. BUCK. Did you or anybody else appear before the Ways and Means Committee and ask that agricultural labor be included in this provision?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] is now referring to day laborers, or hired help on the farm. Of course, the farmers do not ask, nor do their friends ask, to have them included and forced to pay a tax to guarantee a pension to others that is denied to them. He barely makes enough to pay the wages of his hired help, much less an extra tax to take care of his hired man after he leaves him or becomes too old to work.

Every intelligent man knows that the farmer who cultivates his own land does not participate, and cannot participate, in the provisions of the Social Security Act except insofar as he is compelled to pay indirect taxes to meet the burden. His only chance for any compensation at all is through the old-age pension, that would keep the wolf away from his door when he passes the age of his earning power. And yet, while you wring indirect taxes from him to take care of other people, in the richer States, you leave him to the mercy of fate with only such meager assistance as his State is able to match, which the above table shows, runs as low as $6.15 per month. Then you wonder why the old people of this Nation are grasping at every straw in their struggle to secure some measure of economic justice.

Let me warn you now, that you are going to wipe out these inequalities, and do justice to the old people of the agricultural States or you are going to have some such measure as the Townsend bill before you from now on. It would at least treat all old people alike.

This measure, as it now stands, is not only a flagrant injustice but it will be a terrible disappointment to the old people in a majority of the States of this Union. These inequalities must be corrected, and the sooner that is done the better it will be for all concerned. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Pace].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma has referred to this amendment as "madness." I am wondering if there is not a greater tempest behind the amendment. If you check the roll call on the vote on the Townsend plan, you will find there were only nine votes out of the entire agricultural South for the Townsend plan. Our people are usually reasonable; they are patient and long-suffering, but I do not believe our people, who try to be good Americans, are always going to endure such discriminations as now exist. If those 9 Representatives should suddenly become 90 Representatives, I am wondering if the Ways and Means Committee would have proved itself of real service to this Nation in opposing amendments of this kind. I do not say that the present membership from those States would vote for the Townsend plan, but if such inequalities as now exist are continued the people may send Representatives here who will vote for it.

Personally I am fundamentally opposed to matching. I think it brings about a system of Federal control over the States that is endangering our form of government. If the Federal Government is going to contribute to the support of the aged and needy, it should do so in a direct manner, without conditions or reservations. If the committee believes that $20 per month is the proper amount which the Federal Government should pay, then that amount should be paid direct to the beneficiary, and let it be left up to the States to handle their own affairs, without force from the Federal Government, and increase or supplement that amount in such manner and to such an extent as it desires and as its condition permits.

The present matching system is unfair; it results in oldage assistance grants to States, particularly the rich and prosperous States, rather than to the aged and needy. An aged and needy person in Georgia is entitled to the same assistance from his or her Government as an aged and needy person living in any other State of the Union. How unfair the present system is, and the changes sought to be made by this amendment are shown by the following table:

Average amount of old-age assistance per aged needy individual for April 1939, by States, compared with maximum possible average amount under a revised plan of four-fifths Federal matching on $25 per month per aged individual

Note.—The average payments shown for the revised plan are made on the assumption that each State maintains the number of recipients as at present and uses all the additional Federal funds for increased grants to the aged. Those States which wish to put additional individuals on the rolls and also raise the payment somewhat would have different averages than shown above.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. Mott] is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, most of the argument in favor of this amendment so far has come from the Members of what has been referred to as the poorer States. So far as providing for old-age pensions under the present law is concerned, the State of Oregon, which I represent, cannot be classed as one of the poorer States, because we pay one of the highest average old-age pensions of any State in the Union; the average is something more than $21 per month. But as one who believes in substantial old-age pensions and as one who is thoroughly convinced that old-age security is a Federal rather than a State responsibility, I intend to support this amendment.

The people of this country have been led by the present administration to expect, and they do expect, from the bill now before us some real liberalization in the amount of oldage pensions. But as the bill stands now there is no liberalization whatever in it. The alleged liberalization is nothing but an empty gesture. In fact, in my opinion, it is a joker. Those who opposed the Townsend legislation in the House a few days ago criticized the sponsors of that proposal because it mentioned a maximum amount of $200 beyond which a pension could not be paid in any event. It was contended that the sponsors were hypocritical because they knew the bill would not furnish that amount and that the advocates of the bill therefore were trying to fool the old people. The Ways and Means Committee, in reporting this bill, can with much greater accuracy be accused of being hypocritical, because they know that the States which are not able now to furnish even $15 and to match the Federal Government's contribution of $15 will certainly not be able to match a contribution by the Federal Government of $20 on a 50-50 basis. The people of those States, therefore, will get no larger pension under the proposed bill than they have been receiving under existing law. The Colmer amendment requires only a 25-percent contribution by the State, and it will therefore enable every State which wishes to do so to receive the full benefit of the Government's contribution of $20 per month. I propose, therefore, to support the Colmer amendment as a step in the right direction. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] for 2 minutes.

COLMER AMENDMENT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, if 2,000,000 people received old-age pensions under the committee's proposal, the amount will be $480,000,000-$480,000,000 by the Federal Government and $480,000,000 by the States. Under the Colmer amendment the cost will be exactly the same to the Federal Government—not be a penny's difference. It would cost just as much under the committee's proposal, if all States take advantage of the opportunity given by the committee, as under the Colmer amendment. The only answer that can be offered to that is that we know when we offer it to them that they cannot get it. We are offering something in the committee amendment that we know they cannot get. Only two or three States can take advantage of that opportunity. We will penalize the other people because they live in the other 45 States of the Union.

Is this the way to legislate? Do you not think, since taxes are collected from all the people alike according to income, according to the number of gallons of gasoline they use, according to the different articles they use on which the Federal Government levies a tax, that we should distribute it on a fair and equal basis for old-age security purposes? You know and I know that this bill is not going to become a law as the House passes it. We know that the bill must go to another body and that amendments will be offered and

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I cannot yield; I have only 2 minutes. The gentleman and his committee had 8 hours.

Then this bill will be written in the conference committee. So let us adopt the Colmer amendment. [Applause.] [Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the State of New York, considered one of the wealthy States of the Union, we have very gradually been raising the pension for the aged. I think we have raised it too slowly in view of the capacity of the State to pay. I have felt that the legislature in my State could have exercised a little more vision when it came to the question of pensions, because it is perfectly apparent they are not matching the amount the Federal Government is prepared to pay.

If you want to destroy the impulses such as they are in our State and other States, to take care of the old people, then all you have to do is to pass this amendment. Our State was left with a terrific debt some years ago. The people are struggling, even though the State may be rich in resources, struggling to pay off that debt, to balance its budget, trying to pare down the expenses of the State. At the present time the average pension paid in New York State is $24.27, of which the State contributes $12.131/2 and the Federal Government a like amount. Under the provisions of this amendment what would happen? The New York State Legislature could reduce expenses simply by reducing the amount it is now paying the aged and still pay a pension larger than it is paying today; that is, it can save by reducing its contribution to the average old-age pension by putting up only $5, and thus make a saving of $7.131/2 on every pension paid. You will find, if you pass this amendment, that every one of those States instead of raising the pension to the aged is going to reduce its share and still pay a pension as large or a little bit larger than they are paying now. So if you adopt this amendment, you are going to destroy the gradually growing feeling that something more should be done for the old people in these States; and I say to you that it would be an absolute calamity for Pennsylvania, Illinois, New York, and many of these States that are gradually edging up their pensions to have such a bill as this passed, for they will reduce the amount they now contribute while the result will be that the old people will receive no greater and possibly a smaller pension than they are receiving today.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] for 2 minutes.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, I voted for the Townsend plan bill and I am supporting the Colmer amendment. The care and assistance to the aged is a Federal responsibility. Such amount as is paid to the aged as pensions should be paid by the Government directly to the aged and without the requirement of any local or State matching or contribution. Under the present set-up, the aged of our country are receiving different amounts in the different States of the Nation. The old-age assistance benefits range from $6.05 per person in Arkansas to $32.46 in California. These figures are the average amounts of old-age pension or assistance now being received in these States by the needy aged.

In the State of Florida, I believe, the average there received per person is $13.83, and this, of course, is about the average amount received throughout the United States. Of course, it is obvious that any such system as this is wrong. A person in Florida, Mississippi, California, Arkansas, and New York should have exactly the same amount of old-age assistance. It should be equal and the Federal responsibility is equal and should be equally met by Federal appropriation and Federal administration.

I would prefer to see the Government pay even a small amount and let it be paid directly by the Government to the individual without State contribution. Even the Federal amounts which are now paid should be blanketed throughout the country equally in this manner. An aged person can be in hunger and want to the same degree in one State as in another. Dependency, hunger, need, and responsibility know no State lines. Under the present plan, the people in Arkansas, where a low pension is paid, are helping to pay the pensions in California, where a high pension is paid. Direct and indirect Federal taxes collected throughout the United States make up the funds to pay Federal benefits to the aged; therefore similar tax contributions are made from all parts of the country to make up the old-age pension Federal fund. It should undoubtedly be disbursed to the individual in like amount, regardless of where he resides within the United States, of course assuming he is a citizen of the United States for the required statutory period.

The Colmer amendment would direct the Federal Government to pay 80 percent and the State government to pay 20 percent. This, of course, will go a long way toward equalizing the amount received by the aged in the various States. I strongly favor payment of Federal pensions to all of the aged of our country. If some of my colleagues differ with me concerning the word "all," then I am willing to meet them halfway and vote for a bill to pay pensions to all aged persons in the country who do not pay a Federal income tax. If an aged person who has a reasonable amount of property draws the pension and does not particularly need it, he can and will use it to pay his taxes.

If legislation is finally passed at this session compelling State contributions to match Federal old-age pension funds, then the administration of the fund should be authorized and directed to be carried on by local State agencies. In the State of Florida we have in each county five county district officers known as county commissioners. They levy the tax in the various counties and are, in fact, the county financiers. They are the ones in Florida to administer benefits to the aged. They know personally, in almost every case, each aged person in their respective districts and know the needs of each aged individual. Under the bill now before us a provision should be written-and I hope it will beenabling and directing this local control and administration. It will save millions of dollars in administration expense annually and will supply pensions to additional thousands of aged. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Cooley] for 2 minutes.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think that the $20 provision in this bill is nothing but a grand gesture and a false hope. Something has been said about holding out false hopes to the aged people of this Nation. The fact is this committee is dangling before the eyes of the aged people of this Nation the hope of receiving $20 Federal contribution which they know in their hearts the aged people will never receive.

I believe not only in liberalizing pensions but in equalizing the pensions to the aged people of the Nation and I believe the Colmer amendment will place emphasis upon the equalization idea which I have in mind.

I want to call attention to the fact that the Eskimos in Alaska receive now three times the amount in pensions per person than do the people of my State of North Carolina, from which the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee comes. If there is any reason why this committee should be willing to increase the Federal contribution to $20 a month and at the same time oppose the Colmer amendment I would like to know that reason, and I would like to have somebody on the Ways and Means Committee tell me just how the present provision in the bill will help the people of North Carolina when they must know that we are not now taking advantage of the $15 Federal contribution which has been made available.

In North Carolina we realized long ago the necessity of the strong aiding the weak and we provided an equalization fund in connection with our educational system by which the strong counties help the weak counties of the State. The Colmer amendment will put that sort of principle into the social-security bill.

May I call attention to the fact that according to information I have received from the Social Security Board, 31,193 recipients in North Carolina receive an average pension of $9.26 per month, and I am advised that more than 8,000 applications are now pending. No doubt practically all of the 8,000 applicants who have not yet received any pension whatever are just as worthy, just as dependent, and just as much entitled to the relief provded by the socal-securty law as those now drawing pensions. I understand that in my own county the State made its calculations upon a basis of 400 eligibles. I am advised by the welfare officer of Nash County that there are more than 1,500 eligibles in the county. Funds were provided on a basis of 400 eligibles, and the funds provided have been actually divided between 600 aged persons, which means that the 600 now receiving a pension on an average of approximately $8 per month are receiving only about two-thirds of the amount which the State intended for the 400 considered in its original calculations to have. Even though 600 citizens of the county are now receiving a meager pension, the fact remains that according to the record approximately 900 aged and qualified citizens are not receiving any pension whatever.

In the State of South Carolina the average pension is $7.19 per month, in Mississippi $6.47 per month, in the State of Arkansas only $4.22 per month, and I would have you also remember that the Eskimos in Alaska are receiving an average pension of $27.32 per month. In California the average pension is $32.39 per month. If the present system continues, it is perfectly plain to see that the old people of North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Arkansas, and other Southern States will be much better off if they give up the State of their nativity and thumb rides to California or even to far-away Alaska.

When it comes to paying money into the Federal Treasury, North Carolina ranks at or near the top in the list of States. When it comes to receiving assistance from the Federal Government, our State ranks at or near the bottom of the list of States. The Federal Government, if it owes any duty at all to the aged people of the Nation, owes exactly the same duty to the aged people living in the poor States that it does to those who live in States where wealth abounds. The $20 provision in the present bill will only make possible higher and better pensions in wealthy States. The fact that North Carolina and many other States in the Union have not taken advantage of the full $15, which has been available since the enactment of the original Social Security Act, certainly indicates that they will not take advantage of the increase provided in the bill under consideration. If any member of the committee can do so, I would appreciate it very much if he will point out to me just how this $20 provision will help the old people of my State.

I believe that the Colmer amendment will mean much to the old people of North Carolina, and I certainly hope that it may be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] for 3 minutes.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, the trouble with the Colmer amendment is that it abandons the principle of equal matching of Federal grants-in-aid for old-age assistance at tremendous cost to the Federal Government. Last year the Ways and Means Committee brought in and the Congress enacted a bill that repealed $30,000,000 of excise taxes such as those on furs, phonographic records, sporting goods, camera lenses, chewing gum, matches, hot oil, mouth washes, and various other things. If the Colmer amendment is agreed to, the Ways and Means Committee will be under the painful necessity of putting back into the tax laws not only this $30,000,000 but over 10 times as much in order to pay the $407,000,000 that the Colmer amendment will cost. I think that is a sufficient reason why we should think twice before adopting the amendment. Moreover, may I say that the reason for equal matching is based upon the principle that a State is in a position to determine by the light of its own resources, its habits, and its customs what should be granted to these aged people and under what circumstances. So we continue as we have now, a flexible system, for in a country of our size with its various conditions it is essential that any equitable and adequate treatment of the problem of need, which is the basis for relief under title II of the Social Security Act, should be granted in accordance with the variation of the individual's circumstances. These circumstances certainly vary with the geographical location—that is, the State location in which the pensioner finds himself. That is a sound principle. A Federal pension based upon a uniform amendment and applied universally is not sound, as I believe we have demonstrated to you in the general debate.

I am in deep sympathy with some of the States that complain that they have not the funds to match the Government fully to the $15 granted heretofore by the Federal Government; $20 hereafter. Perhaps they do not want to.

Let me call attention to the State of Mississippi in connection with its road projects. From 1935, according to the Bureau of Roads, to the present time, road projects amounting to $41,617,000 have been put into effect in Mississippi, of which sum Mississippi received over $18,000,000 from Federal grants, leaving $23,000,000 that was borne by the State. Mississippi sold bonds, put on a sales tax, and otherwise raised the money for this when it wanted to. But in 1938 Mississippi spent for old-age pensions only one-half million dollars.

It seems to me when those are the actual figures—and there are other similar cases—that we might well consider whether these States actually want to take care of their aged with their own resources or whether they are merely looking to the Federal Treasury—in other words, Uncle Sam—to pay vastly more than he has been doing, so the home folks shall not be burdened by the cost of caring for their own.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, in my State the people have been able to advance $10 and the Federal Government aid is the same amount. The needy people of our State are now being paid a pension of $20.56. If the Colmer amendment is adopted, for which I am going to vote, and assuming that my State continues to pay $10 as it has in the past, the aged people of my State will receive a pension of $30. Under the bill as written Montana would not be benefited, as we are unable to match the $15 provided for under the present law.

I want to ask the membership of this House how in the name of God we can expect people in the high altitudes, where an enormous amount of fuel is required, to pay their coal bill, pay their rent, pay for their clothing, and pay for their food out of the sum of $20.56 a month? Each of us is drawing a salary of $10,000 a year. I ask, how are we going to look in the faces of the needy old people of this country and keep that money and deny them enough, if you please, to get even some of the common necessaries of life?

It seems to me to be no less than outrageous for us to stand here this afternoon quibbling over a few dollars; a few dollars for whom? For the aged people of this country, who, in my section of the country, built our schoolhouses, our churches, our courthouses, and other public improvements, and improved our farms and irrigated our lands, many of whom are today in their declining years and in want. These are the people we are trying to legislate for here today. The Colmer amendment is not a long step forward, but is some improvement over the present situation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. Dempsey] for 2 minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I propose to support the Colmer amendment because I believe it is a disgraceful thing for this great, wealthy Nation to see aged people with but a few more years to live lacking the bare necessities of life. I further regret that frequent promises have been made to the people of this Nation, largely by persons of my political faith, telling them that no man or woman will want for food, and that we now say to the people of the States, "If your State cannot contribute anything to the pension fund, the Federal Government has no interest whatever in whether you live or die."

Much has been said here today about taxes. What do you think of a State such as New Mexico, where the Federal Government owns 55 percent of the total lands of the State and pays not a dime of tax to the people of our State? The 45 percent remaining provides the money for old-age assistance and the various activities we have to carry on. I believe that coming here with a bill and saying: "We are going to liberalize the assistance to the aged," and then saying, "We will give you $20 a month if your State will do the same thing," is not a joke, because it is a very serious matter. It is fooling the old people of this country who should expect more from the Congress of the United States than that. For one I do not propose to do it. I believe if a person in one State is entitled to a certain amount from the Federal Government a person in another State is entitled to the same amount. Most certainly the obligation of the Federal Government to all needy aged persons is the same, whether they reside in New Mexico or New York, yet the opponents of this amendment would force the Congress to practice discrimination in violation of the very fundamental principle of our American Government.

To my mind it is deceit of a vicious form to seek to lead the aged citizens of this country, who are in dire want, to believe that we are liberalizing our old-age assistance policy, when in reality we are doing nothing of the kind. I do not want to be, nor will I wittingly be, a party to that sort of subterfuge.

To refuse to adopt this amendment is not economy; it is parsimony of the type that justifies embittered criticism of this Congress by those whom we have led to believe we would help. When we appropriate lavishly for those who are ablebodied and able to withstand life's vicissitudes, how can we justify our failure to do likewise for those who become enfeebled and dependent through declining years? Are we to revert to the cruel practices of paganism and savagery and destroy those now aged whose fortitude and courage once provided the bulwark upon which our Nation has grown and prospered?

The merit and the justice of this amendment is beyond question; it should be adopted. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I for one would hate to come before you hat in hand and constantly plead poverty on behalf of my State. I do not think there is a material distinction between the State of Mississippi and the State of Michigan. It is just a question of whether the State of Michigan will pay a pension and whether the State of Mississippi declines to pay one. I believe the reflection is upon the State which refuses to take care of its own problems. My State levies taxes upon the property and wealth of the State and Mississippi will not tap its tax reservoirs and for that reason appropriates about one-half million dollars for pensions.

They would be pleased to come in here and get four-fifths of, say, three or four or five million dollars of Federal money, and they would pay this out in a pension to their needy citizens. It has even been admitted on this floor that if the Federal grant is increased they would even reduce the stringency of the needs test in the poor States in order to spread these pensions wider and thicker. But they will not do it of themselves. Why not? Do not try to tell me that the State of Mississippi is so poverty stricken that it cannot pay a decent and reasonable pension. This reflection upon the $40 gross payment which is provided in the present bill, that it is a hoax or a false gesture, is entirely wrong. I resent such demagoguery and such inferences.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DINGELL. I am sorry.

That $40 amendment was offered in good faith. It will produce the desired effect if the States will show their sincerity, their honesty, and their willingness to meet the Federal Government on a dollar-for-dollar basis. It will do just exactly what it was intended to do, that is, it will pay up to $40 a month to every eligible pensioner in your State, or pay an aged couple as high as $80 a month. That is $960 per year in cold rolled American money, and you cannot discount or laugh that off.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I am sorry; I have only 3 minutes.

I have heard a gentleman trying to tell this House—and I do not know his method of calculation or what kind of arithmetic he learned during his early years—that this amendment will not cost the Government any more than the Federal Government is paying now. It is sheer bunk and nonsense and an insult to a man's intelligence to try to get away with a statement of that kind. If the total amount involved is half a billion dollars, on a 50-50 basis the Federal Government is called upon to pay $250,000,000, and on a four-fifths maximum basis the Federal Government would pay $400,000,000 out of $500,000,000. Is there a difference? I will say there is a difference! One hundred and fifty million dollars, or 60 percent.

This proposal would shift the burden from the derelict States and place it upon the Federal Government without increasing pensions, certainly not in my State. Moreover, it would freeze the pension base at the lowest level paid by the so-called poor States. Remember, the Federal Government must match payments, not in one State or in the poor States but in all States. [Applause]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] for 2 minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, this proposed amendment strikes me from four different angles. First, we confuse dollars with what you might call frugal living. Anyone who has lived in the North as well as in the South knows that you can enjoy a frugal living in the South with fewer dollars than you can in the North. The dollar cost of living is not so great in a mild climate as in a cold climate.

Second, the adoption of the amendment would further dislocate and destroy industry as it is now operating and that would in turn add to the insecurity of the present structure.

Third, as the committee recommends, the people can now act on old-age assistance and pensions by increasing the amount of the State appropriation in accordance with the needs, as pointed out by the distinguished gentleman from California, who is a member of the committee.

Fourth, if you adopt an amendment which moves in the direction of destroying friendliness toward the social-security program by imposing on the so-called northern industrial States a greater burden than they can possibly carry, in order to give financial relief, we will say, to the States that are not so blessed with industry, that in turn would undermine the entire social-security structure and eventually lead to a break-down of the program and destroy the Social Security Act through a demand for its repeal.

For these reasons, as well as others that could be enumerated, I shall vote against the amendment, and, of course, I hope it will be defeated. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. THOMASON). The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. Leland M. Ford] for 2 minutes.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I have heard many remarks made here today about some poor States. I have heard the remark made that California is the only State that is paying the $15. I have heard something about the matter of gestures, but let me tell you men that, as far as California is concerned, it is no gesture on the part of California, because California will be benefited by this amendment.

You people may or may not know, but you ought to know, that California is carrying the load, or at least part of the load, of some 47 other States that either cannot or will not raise the money to take care of their needy aged. Therefore I think it is proper that this load should be equalized and the Federal responsibility recognized. I do not think there is any question but what there should be a uniform amount that the Federal Government should contribute, and regardless of what my colleague who preceded me a few moments ago said, that all States are equal in purchasing power, any man who has helped to make up a tax roll knows that States have different amounts of taxable wealth.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. I cannot yield.

With reference to my friend the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck], he comes from a part of California somewhat removed, some 400 or 500 miles away from this load in southern California. We have 111,000 indigents in Los Angeles County. We have 132,000 on aged aid in the State, of which half are in Los Angeles County. My colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] may not know what the pressure of this means, but in Los Angeles County alone $8,000,000 goes on the taxes of the homes of all the people to pay this money. This means about 40 cents in the tax rate.

If this amount is made uniform and the Federal Government will assume its proper and honorable responsibility by assisting the respective States to take care of their just proportion of this load, this action will keep these aged people from going to California and placing on that State a disproportionate and unjust burden. It will also permit these aged people to remain in their respective States, which are actually their real homes, and retain these ties of kinship and friendship that may be dear to them.

These elderly people must be taken care of. If they actually are in need, they will either be taken care of here or on the indigent rolls. I appeal to each Representative of each one of the States to do his duty by these old people, to his own State, and to the other States, who are doing their duty, particularly California, to vote for this amendment on the further ground of common justice.

California is paying relief and aged aid benefits for many of the 47 States. It cannot much longer continue to do this, and I therefore appeal to you for this support to which we are eminently entitled.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mitchell] for 2 minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, 4 years ago I stood on the floor of this House when we were considering this legislation and I said then that if it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to provide a pension for old people, it is not providing that pension when we base it upon the wealth of any particular State, and I stand here to ask you this question: Are we pensioning the wealthy States of our great Government or are we pensioning the poor people, the aged people of this Government that we say we are pensioning? I think it is well for us to stop and think of this.

I am in favor of this amendment because it comes closer to the remarks I made 4 years ago than anything I have heard offered on this floor for the relief of the aged of this Nation.

I take no stock in the statement that we have no poor States and no rich States. I heard a member of the Committee say a moment ago that Mississippi is as wealthy as the State of Michigan. I am wondering if he has any poor counties in the State of Michigan that are not quite as wealthy as the county in which Detroit is situated. We do have poor counties and poor States, we do have rich people and poor people, and if this Congress owes the old people of this Nation a duty to pension them, we ought to do it without regard to State lines.

I am going to vote for the amendment. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Allen] for 2 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, by the great committee of this House, the Ways and Means Committee, we have been led upon the mountain top, we have been shown the promised land, and now, by their mandate of 50-50, we must return to wander in the wilderness. [Laughter.]

I want to present these facts to you gentlemen who come from the great industrial sections. The gentleman from Michigan a moment ago made a comparison between the Southern States and the great State of Michigan. Did it ever occur to you gentlemen from the industrial sections that every dime we get gravitates right back to you? Do you know that every tool that we use in every walk of life comes from you people? It is made by your workmen. Do you not know that you will be the recipients indirectly of every dime that is paid to the southern agricultural sections?

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. I am sorry, but I do not have

Mr. Chairman, I present this to you as an industrial problem. What this country is suffering with is a lack of distribution of money, a lack of buying power in the hands of the great poorer sections of the country. If you want to rehabilitate this country, then make it possible for the poor people in the farming sections, the farming South and the farming West, to buy your industrial goods, and this country will be better off.

Your greatest market is not abroad, but at home. Countless millions do not have the purchasing power to secure the things they need. The wealth has been accumulating in our large centers in the North and East so that now the great mass of humanity in the less-favored sections are without purchasing power. I say to you who represent the financial centers that, in my opinion, you are pursuing a short-sighted course. You have the factories and you have the funds with which to operate them. Many of your people need the work. Our people, an agricultural people, need to buy your goods. We have agricultural products that you need. You have it within your power to bring about a redistribution of these elements. I say to you who represent industrial sections that your welfare and the welfare of your constituents, in my humble opinion, will be best served by recognizing the need of the whole Nation and that the Nation cannot be healthy as long as we have submerged millions in our land.

Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer] will go a long way to bring about this redistribution of the goods of the land. Under this amendment every old person who qualifies for this assistance would receive a minimum of $25 per month, $20 of which would be paid by the Federal Government and $5 by the State. If a State puts up more than $5, of course, the amount would be more than $25.

Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I would like to see our aged get more than this minimum of $25, but this would be such an improvement over what we have now that it would be a Godsend. Personally I would like to see the Federal Government pay not less than $30 monthly direct to our aged. This was the proposal of my great and lamented friend, Senator Huey P. Long. He introduced a bill to do that and I have a bill pending which embodies his principles. I do want to see the principle of greater Federal contributions established. preferably a direct Federal pension, because this is one of the best ways I can think of to bring about a more just equalization of the goods of the land and the opportunities for making a living. I am wholeheartedly supporting this amendment, and I sincerely hope that it will pass. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Massingale] for 2 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to one matter that appears to me to be somewhat unfair, and that is this: When some gentleman was speaking in behalf of this amendment two or three of the members of the committee having charge of the bill asked in unison how he had any assurance that the States were going to participate. I will tell you how you get it. You get it from the language of your own bill, from your own words. There is no change in anything in the wording of this bill except in the percentage quota. It is simply changed from one-half to 80 percent in one place, and that is the only change there is in it, so that if you have the authority now, or have any assurance now, you will have it when the Colmer amendment is put into the bill.

My distinguished colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY]and he is a dear friend of mine—is uneasy about the $417,-000,000 that he says this bill will cost more than the committee bill will cost. The gentleman got his information from Mr. Altmeyer. Mr. Altmeyer is the Chairman of the Security Board, and he consulted the index of the dead Indians on the rolls in Oklahoma. That is the way he got it. [Applause.] Mr. Altmeyer is an excellent administrator, but I fear his experience with social security in Oklahoma gave him an enlarged photograph of the activities of those Indians. This committee bill without such amendment as the Colmer amendment means nothing to the aged poor of Oklahoma or any other State unable to match with further or additional State contributions the mentioned increase. It is deceptive to pass this bill and it cannot possibly do any good for the poor of the States that have been unable to match the Federal Government up to $15. I support the Colmer amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Colmer amendment. I think the amendment brought in by the Ways and Means Committee, matching 50-50 up to $40, is the proper manner to handle this subject. This is no idle gesture, as many Members have stated. What we want to accomplish is to bring home to the Representatives of the various States their duty to their own people. That is the real object. There is too much effort to put the whole burden of old-age pensions on the Federal Government. When one speaks of increasing the cost, which is about $175,000,000 at the present time, by $407,000,000 additional, you simply are burdening the Federal Government with a tax that the people cannot stand. There is no reason in the world why States should not come forward and do their share toward aiding the old people. The State legislatures should meet the Congress halfway in providing decent old-age pensions. They must be made pension-conscious. That is the problem that now faces us. The Federal Government initiated to a large extent this aid to the aged, and the State legislatures should realize their duty toward the people.

The Federal Government cannot afford this additional burden anywhere near as well as the States can afford to bring up their contributions to match the Federal Government's allotment, so that the aged people will be getting the $40 that they are entitled to. That is the question the Members of this House have to settle here in a few minutes. It is as to whether we want to aid the aged people or remove from certain States the burden and put it onto other States. I repeat, the Federal Government is in no position to add $407,000,000 to its expenditures without finding a way in which to raise that sum from the taxable incomes of the people of the country. If you are going to spend more money, you ought to show where we can secure the money. The people will object to raising their taxes; and where is the money to come from other than through taxation or through adding to the public debt, neither of which we are in any condition to do?

Any increase in the contribution above 50 percent is a step in the direction of an eventual 100-percent Federal contri-

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Disney] made a powerful speech in this House yesterday, in which he opposed any Federal contribution in excess of 50 percent. I refer Members to that speech for the reasons why the proposals for increasing the Federal share of old-age pension payments should be defeated. The reasons he advanced are unanswerable, and I agree with them.

The outstanding argument which is made in favor of increasing the Federal share is that many of the States cannot afford to match the full $15 payment which the Federal Government stands willing to make.

But let me ask this question: Is the Federal Government in any better shape than the States to assume an increased expense for old-age pensions?

Does any State have a bonded indebtedness equal in proportion to the Federal debt which now approaches forty-five billions?

Have the States pushed their taxing powers to the limit as has the Federal Government?

We must not forget that every cent we appropriate here must come from the people in taxes of one form or another, imposed at one time or another. These taxes must come from the people, whether they are imposed by the Federal Government or by the States, and what the States individually cannot afford the Federal Government cannot afford.

The amendment to the present act which is proposed by the committee is sound and reasonable. The amendments which are proposed here by individual Members are unsound and unreasonable. In many instances they would not increase the amount of pension which the individual receives, but would simply shift a part of the cost of old-age pensions from the States to the Federal Government.

Under the bill as recommended to the House by the committee, a pension of $40 can be provided if the States meet the Federal Government half way in the amount to be contributed. If the States are relieved of their responsibility in the matter, the tendency will be to put anyone and everyone on the rolls and the cost of old-age pensions will mount skyward.

I hope and trust that the House will uphold the committee in its recommendation and vote down the various amendments proposed by individual Members.

This amendment should be defeated for the best interests of the aged people of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER] for 1 minute.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, anyone who examines the amendments proposed to the Social Security Act must be aware of the many grave difficulties implicit in these proposals. We are confronted with the knowledge that under present economic circumstances, only two or three States at most will find it possible to match a Federal appropriation amounting to $20 per month for each pensioner. We are certainly conscious of the increased burden which the passage of this measure will impose upon the Federal Government itself.

Nevertheless, despite the imperfections which are always inherent in the work of human beings, I am convinced that this bill merits the support of the Nation.

Its undeniable improvements over the existing law, in my opinion, outweigh the arguments of those who oppose its passage.

First, and foremost, this legislation makes it evident that our Nation is vitally concerned with the welfare of its aged citizens; that we recognize the hopeless inadequacy of the pension system now in operation in most of our States; that we are determined to correct this situation if it is possible.

I am confident that the coming of 1940 and a change in the political leadership of our Nation will bring about such economic improvement throughout the country that those States which now find it impossible to match a $20 pension contribution will become increasingly able to bear their share of the responsibility.

This legislation will bring new hope to the men and women who have been treated so heartlessly by our Nation. I feel that the rebirth of that hope is important to the morale of our people.

But this series of amendments acts as more than a mere moral stimulant. By advancing the date when old-age insurance payments will become payable from 1942 to 1940, we are performing a service recognized as necessary by most of our economists.

The inclusion of maritime workers within the terms of the Act makes the law more effective in meeting the needs of our people, and I look forward to the day provision may be made to care for all our needy citizens, whatever may be their occupation.

Each of these changes in the law is desirable, but I am particularly proud of the part played by the Republican Party in correcting the most unfortunate provision of the existing law, the indefensible gigantic "reserve fund," which would have opened the path to a spending policy of even more incredible proportions than the one in which we are now floundering. The elimination of this reserve and the placing of our funds in a true trust fund on a pay-as-you-go basis are among the outstanding legislative achievements of this session of Congress. The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee deserve the thanks of the Nation for their part in establishing this change.

Every Congressman who votes for this measure does so with a complete awareness of its many shortcomings. Despite these failings, I favor its passage in the interests of our deserving needy and the fulfillment of our obligations to them.

You gentlemen from Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi whine that your States cannot pay their just share of old-age pensions. If your people would start voting the Republican ticket they perhaps would not be in such dire need and your States would be able to pay the taxes of some northern Republican States.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] for 1 minute.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the proposal of the Ways and Means Committee to increase the benefits to $40 per month for those States which can afford to match dollar for dollar the Federal contribution of $20 puts us in a rather unique position. We must decide in short order whether or not we will vote for a measure which will enable the poor States to help the rich States meet their benefit payments or whether the rich States will help the poor meet theirs. Rather than to have the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, it seems to me that, inasmuch as we cannot have complete equity, we should adopt the proposed amendment and have the rich States help the poor States meet their old-age problems.

And my friends there is more of genuine equity in such a policy than might appear at first thought, and the proposed amendment does not penalize the richer States unfairly. Let us keep in mind a fact which is frequently overlooked by those listing the taxes paid the Federal Government by the various States. Let us realize clearly here and now that the taxes paid to the Federal Government by industrial States are paid from profits earned from sales made throughout America; therefore, the taxes which corporations forward to the Federal Government are actually paid by the citizens of all the States in which these corporations do businessthey are simply reported from the States which happen to grant the charters to these corporations. Consequently, it is no more than right and fair that this fact be kept in mind whenever the hoary old delusion is aired, as it has been today by certain speakers, to the effect that the rural States pay little Federal tax and are therefore in poor position to ask for increased consideration from Government funds.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN REPORTING AND PAYING TAXES

If I do nothing else in this talk, I want to make it crystal clear that the States reporting large Federal taxes paid by corporations engaged in Nation-wide business are not, in fact, paying this tax; they collect it from the profitable operations undertaken in 47 other States and simply report to Washington the tax from the home address of the corporation. The fact that the envelope carrying the tax check to Washington is postmarked New Jersey or New York or Rhode Island does not mean that these States have made a disproportionately big contribution to the Federal tax collector and are therefore in position to resent equitable treatment on a per capita basis of the people of the rural and nonindustrialized States.

While we are on this subject let us not overlook one further fact, since it has an important bearing on this amendment, which, after all, is simply a proposal to permit all States to share equally on a per capita basis in whatever old-age assistance the Federal Government provides, whether it be fifteen, twenty, or twenty-five dollars per month as the share of the Federal Government. That fact is that these rich, industrialized, corporation-housing States also find money raising by taxation easier by virtue of the fact that these corporations "bring home to Rome" the profits garnered in the 47 other States and use these profits to expand plant equipment, build new buildings, increase capital holdings, and expand income statements, all of which are in turn taxable by the States themselves. Thus, from the profits earned by operations in the rural States, these industrial States reap rich State tax receipts and are in a correspondingly better position to pay taxes for old-age assistance, for poor relief, and for other social legislation. Consequently it is not blue-sky economy or prejudicial legislation which comes before us, as the Colmer amendment does, asking that at least insofar as the Federal contribution to old-age benefits is concerned all States should share and share alike regardless of their ability to match these payments on a dollar-for-dollar basis.

Unless some such amendment as that now before us is adopted the myth of $40-a-month pensions, made possible by the States' matching dollar for dollar the Federal Government's $20 contribution, will be exactly that and nothing more for about 40 States of the Union, and New York and a few more States will be the only ones benefited by the proposals of liberalization by the Ways and Means Committee. Worse than that, the poorer States in rural areas will actually be taxed to help bring greater benefits to the richer States, because we all recognize, I am sure, that the increased cost of old-are assistance is shared by all States.

Thus we find coming into being the matter I spoke about on May 31 in discussing H. R. 6466, and the discriminations which the present Social Security Act make against the rural areas are either deliberately or unwittingly aggravated. As this act now operates, we find rural States discriminated against by virtue of the fact that many of its unemployment and old-age benefits are barred to it by occupational exemptions which exclude farmers and small-business men from its provisions and awards and we find that rural States are not now able in many cases to match on a dollar-for-dollar basis the Federal contributions to old-age benefits which are now available. To expand these Federal contributions to $20 per month without repealing or modifying the dollar-for-dollar matching requirements is simply to increase the discrimination against the "have not" States in favor of the "took it from us" States and does not correct the present inequalities.

BENEFITS FOR SOME—COSTS FOR OTHERS

My colleagues, it was to protest against these inequalities and to correct the accident of geography which now plays such an important part in our security program that many of us from rural districts voted for H. R. 6466 on June 1. An important principle is at stake in all these deliberations about old-age pensions and social security—that principle is the question of whether this country is to continue a program of sectional security with benefits for some and just the costs thereof for others, or whether we are to work out a program of uniform benefits for citizens of a certain age and condition throughout the country. Thus far, social security as presently practiced is not conforming with this second principle. Most of us voting for H. R. 6466 did so with the realization that the Senate would have to eliminate certain undesirable provisions before putting it into practice but also with the realization that if we permit the present program to become too well set in its policies before eliminating its discriminatory features we shall then be unable to adopt a proper pension and social-security program for

The influence of the 97 Members voting for H. R. 6466 is already making itself felt in this House by the amendments and changes proposed in the Social Security Act which would reduce the hazard of the present contemplated $47,000,000,000 trust fund and which would reduce the discrimination against certain sections and groups. I urge those 97 Members and all others believing in fairness and justice to the aged of this country regardless of place of residence or pursuit of occupation to join in voting for the Colmer amendment to permit all States to share equally on a per capita basis in the Federal old-age benefits contributed by your Government and mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. Voorhis] for 1 minute.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I am for this amendment because I believe it is a truly national amendment; because the interests of my section of the country are best served by giving a better chance, a better degree of purchasing power to those sections of the country that have the lowest purchasing power. I believe that for the same reason that I believe our main concern should be the groups of people who have the lowest purchasing power. It has been well said by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Allen] that every dollar of purchasing power that goes into the poorer States that will benefit from this amendment returns again to those great financial centers, when the people of those poorer States make purchases of goods which they have to buy from those centers or pay interest on the debts.

So I believe that in the interest of general justice and fairness, to make more of a national program out of this, this amendment should be adopted. The nearer we get to a national program in this matter the better off we are going to be. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook] for 1 minute.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I believe that old-age pensions and assistance for the aged is a Federal program. There have been some remarks made here about the State of Michigan today. Let me say to you that the State of Michigan has not matched the $15 that has been offered to them by the Federal Government. This Congress made an offer that, if accepted by the States, would give the old people $30 apiece. The State legislatures have avoided their share of the duty to old people up to this time. The only thing the Legislature of the State of Michigan did was to fail to match the $15, and then send a memorial to Congress to pass the Townsend bill. In other words, they just passed the buck. It is about time that we did make this a Federal old-age pension and see that the old people are paid a fair amount, and forget about asking some of the State legislatures to handle this problem. We furnish most of the money; why not furnish all the money and make it a direct Federal aid.

I am for this amendment because I think it comes the closer to a Federal old-age pension, which will avoid any passing the buck by the State legislatures. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Doughton] for 5 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Colmer amendment.

In the brief time allotted to me, of course, I cannot state the many objections which to my mind are valid against this amendment. In my judgment, its adoption would be a serious, regrettable, and major blunder.

A few days ago this House reflected great credit upon itself, and, in my judgment, rendered outstanding service to the country by defeating an unreasonable, impractical oldage pension plan. The Colmer amendment is a long step in the direction that is proposed to be traveled by the Townsend bill. You will find that practically every Townsendite in this House will be for this amendment, because he believes ultimately that that will be the destination at which we will arrive.

There has been a great deal said about the poorer States. If there is any one desire in my heart above another it is to see justice done to dependent aged, needy, and destitute people. Mr. Chairman, I vigorously oppose, in carrying out this worthy purpose, that the States shall unload upon the Federal Government their own duty and their own responsibility. Prior to the adoption of the present social-security law the States had this entire burden to carry. This was their recognized and realized responsibility, and as far as I know, no one in the so-called poorer States was starving and destitute of clothing. The Federal Government, believing that what was being done for the old people was not adequate, genererously came in and said, "We will carry half the load." If Mississippi or any other State cannot give three or four or five dollars to help its needy, destitute old people, how can it educate its people? How can it spend millions and millions in building roads? According to my good friend Mr. Collins the load will soon be lightened. Mississippi's load will be very much lightened if so many migrate to New York and Washington and other places.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Does it not appear to the Committee that this is an attempt on the part of many States of the Union to get away from the proper taxing of their own people and drive that burden on the other States of the Union? Is it not a fact that in the case of Louisiana, about which the gentleman spoke here today, not because I say it, but because the Governor says it, it is the most prosperous State in the Union? Let me quote:

If you come to Louisiana as a home seeker, Louisiana today is the most prosperous State in the Union. There is a thousand dollars exemption on homesteads. There is a livestock exemption. New homes are tax exempt for 3 years and new industries for 10 years.

[Laughter.]

Then let me read again what they say about tax exemption or tax-free homes in Mississippi:

If Mississippi continues on, they have gone a long way toward providing tax-free homes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Well, my good friend from North Carolina challenged me to know what this would do for North Carolina. I speak for the Federal-tax payers of North Carolina the same as I do for the State-tax payers. I will say to my friend that North Carolina is balancing her budget and able to meet her obligations, while the Federal Government is short of this desired goal. The gentleman would not dare stand up here and say to this House that North Carolina could not match the Federal contribution.

Mr. COOLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. If you want to say that North Carolina is not able to match 50-50 the Federal contribution to take care of her dependent old people, I will yield.

Mr. COOLEY. I want to say to the gentleman that he knows that North Carolina has not yet met the Federal contribution of $15 and will never meet the $20 contribution.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; and that is a tribute in one sense, and in another it might be a criticism; but I do assert that our State is able to match on a 50-50 basis any contribution made by the Federal Government that is necessary for our aged needy people, and I challenge my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] to deny that statement.

Mr. COOLEY. My question was one asking the gentleman to explain to the House how this bill would help North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot answer the gentleman's question in the brief time at my disposal.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WARREN). The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time on this amendment has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COLMER) there were—ayes 88, noes 162.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. Colmer and Mr. Doughton.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 97, noes 174.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. Terry].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment similar to that offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON]

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman-

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan, a member of the committee, rise?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. To offer an amendment. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan, a member of the committee, to offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Woodruff of Michigan: Page 3, line 4, amend section 3 (a) of title I of the Social Security Act to read as follows:

"PAYMENTS TO STATES

"Sec. 3. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing October 1, 1939, (1) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, equal to two-thirds of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each needy individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not an inmate of a public institution, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $45, and (2) 4 percent of such amount, which shall be used for paying the costs of administering the State plan or for old-age assistance, or both, and for no other purpose: Provided, That the Federal contribution shall not exceed 50 percent in those States which reduce expenditures for old-age assistance under the provisions of this section."

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no Member of this House who for more years has been interested in giving to our old people a pension, or an annuity or whatever you care to call it, that will keep the needy aged in at least some degree of comfort.

An inspection of the records of the Social Security Board discloses the fact that there is but one State in the Union which today pays the maximum, or has averaged the maximum amount that can be paid under the provisions of section 1, paragraph 3, of the Social Security Act. It is perfectly apparent to me that the 280,000 old people in this country who many months ago qualified for an old-age pension, but who today have never received a penny, can never know the security to which they are entitled until something more is done to enable the States to meet their obligations, which in my opinion are primarily State obligations.

It occurs to me that if by an increase in the proportion of the money expended for old-age pensions we could step up the amount the Federal Government contributes we could in this way bring relief to those who have not up to this time been able to secure a pension. We could also bring additional relief to those who are already on the pension rolls.

I think there is not a man in this House who will rise in his place and say that a pension of $5 a month is an adequate pension to pay an old person.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. LEAVY. The gentleman referred to the fact that there were a substantial number of persons not on the rolls. I have those figures. For the purpose of making it clear let me give them to the gentleman. There are now 280,873 persons who are qualified to receive pensions in States which are unable to pay them.

One other question, if the gentleman will permit, does the gentleman's amendment mean that it will be a 2 to 1 matching, that the Federal Government will give $2 each time the State raises $1?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. That is correct up to a maximum of $45 per month. I say further, and I want to make it perfectly clear, that under my amendment it will be possible for an old person providing his necessities demand such an amount to draw as much as $45 per month. Let me call attention also to the fact that the maximum provided will enable an old person to be hospitalized if necessary.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Gladly.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is there anything in the gentleman's amendment to assure these 280,000 persons getting some pension? They still might not get any pension, any more than they do now.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. It has been stated by those in opposition to the Colmer amendment that we have no assurance that the increased amount paid by the Federal Government would go into the pockets of the old people.

I call the attention of the committee to the proviso I attached to my original amendment. I will read it. The proviso reads:

Provided, That the Federal Government's contribution shall not exceed 50 percent in those States which reduce expenditures for old-age assistance under the provisions of this section.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. I am anxious to know what that proviso means. Does it mean if the States reduce their total expenditures to the individuals or the total amount of the expenditures those States will not participate in the benefits of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Exactly.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan

[Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. Chairman, before voting on this amendment each Member should realize just what it does. The amendment increases the Federal contribution a straight two-thirds. The Colmer amendment was a mild one in comparison with this one. Any one who voted against the Colmer amendment should certainly vote against this one, and most of those who supported the Colmer amendment should also vote against this amendment.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Mich-

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Did the gentleman say my amendment would cost more than the Colmer amendment? Mr. McCORMACK. Wait until I get through. I may not satisfy my friend from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I ask the gentleman, do I understand him correctly?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Then he is as mistaken as he can possibly be.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts has been mistaken many times, but whether the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Michigan is mistaken is for each individual Member of the House to de-

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. My authority is the Chairman of the Social Security Board and it is to the effect those figures the gentleman has in mind are not correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Was the gentleman's information from the Chairman of the Social Security Board based upon two-thirds being paid on need or is it based on the gentleman's amendment where need is eliminated and where anybody 65 years of age or over can get it?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. If my amendment is adopted, the section under which these allotments are paid would be administered exactly as it is today. Every penny would be based on need and nothing else.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's amendment certainly does not carry out that thought.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Oh, it does. It carries the phraseology of the act itself.

Mr. McCORMACK. The present bill contains the following language:

From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter—

And so forthwith respect to each needy individual.

The gentleman's amendment eliminates "need." Why did he leave the word "need" out? What is the significance of the word "need" in this present bill and why did the gentleman leave that out?

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas. Mr. KLEBERG. I did not get the gentleman's first statement clearly, but I got enough of it to arrive at the impression that what the gentleman is trying to tell the House is that the amendment we now have before us is just as much of a racket as the amendment we just voted down. Is that correct?

Mr. McCORMACK. The characterization of the amendment I will leave to the gentleman from Texas. I probably would characterize it a little more mildly.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. I just want to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Kleberg] if he would apply that same epithet to the bill as a whole.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think we can take that remark as impersonal. None of us need get excited in debate. Of course, we say things extemporaneously in debate that we do not always mean.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois. Mr. McKEOUGH. May I call the gentleman's attention to line 6 of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan? He still leaves it in the language that calls for an approved plan, which absolutely nullifies the whole busi-

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? I wish to apologize to the gentleman if he will permit me.

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. May I say to the gentleman and to the Committee that the word "needy" was left out of the amendment inadvertently.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman want to put the word "needy" back?

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I certainly do. Mr. McCORMACK. All right. I am glad any misunderstanding between my friend and myself is cleared up. I yield to the gentleman to submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment may be amended by including the word "needy."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Woodruff]?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I thank my friend from Massachusetts. May I say one more word? May I say to the gentleman and to the Committee that so long as I am a Member of this House I will vote for no pension that is not based upon the "need" of the individual? I will not vote to tax the poor people of this country to pay a pension to those who have more of the world's goods than those taxed.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman having amended his amendment, he thereby admits, at least by implication, that my criticism, so far as the elimination of the word "needy," was correct. I will proceed to present my views upon his amended amendment. As between this and the Colmer amendment, the Colmer amendment is still far more preferable. The Colmer amendment undertook to take care of the weaker States. It went too far. Something along the line of the Colmer amendment I believe in, but this amendment is just as objectionable and more so in its present form. It should be rejected.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment on the desk that I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Terry as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. Woodruff of Michigan: On page 3, strike out lines 3 to 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"PAYMENT TO STATES

"Sec. 3. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing January 1, 1940, (1) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, equal to the sum of the following proportions of the amounts expended during such quarter as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each needy individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not an inmate of a public institution:

"(A) Two-thirds of such expenditures, not counting so much thereof with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds

15. plus

"(B) One-half of the amount by which such expenditures exceed the amount which may be counted under paragraph (A), not counting so much thereof with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $40, plus.

"(2) 5 percent of the amount of the payment under clause (1) of this subsection, which shall be used for paying the costs of administering the State plan or for old-age assistance, or both, and for no other purpose."

On page 4, line 6, strike out "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof "the State's proportionate share."

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I propose to substitute for that of the gentleman from Michigan is very simple. It merely divides payments for old-age assistance into two brackets. In the first bracket the Federal Government provides two-thirds of the first $15. In the second bracket the State and the Federal Government match equally up to the maximum amount of $40, which is permitted in the bill under consideration.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. If I understand the gentleman's amendment correctly, it would do the same thing as the amendment which was defeated except upon a smaller scale; in other words, the ratio would be two for one rather than four for one, as in the amendment we proposed.

Mr. TERRY. Yes; that is correct. The Federal Government would match in the first bracket two for one, and after that equally with the States, up to the $40 maximum.

Mr. COLMER. I just wanted to say to the gentleman I am going to support his amendment.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. Has the gentleman any estimate of the cost?

Mr. TERRY. I understand the cost would be somewhere between $45,000,000 and $110,000,000.

Mr. BUCK. Per year.

Mr. TERRY. That is the information that has been given me.

Mr. BUCK. I just wanted to determine the cost so the members of the Committee could understand what the cost

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman vield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. In answer to the question of the gentleman from California, may I say that an exactly similar amendment was referred to the Social Security Board, which has given us the following information:

The probable additional cost of this change is $45,000,000 to $110,000,000 per year.

I have here the original letter from Mr. Altmeyer, Chairman of the Social Security Board.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. Mr. WHITTINGTON. The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to increase the Federal contribution to the ratio of 2 to 1 up to $15, and after that carry out the provision of the existing bill which calls for a 50-percent contribution?

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am not clear on just what this amendment will cost, according to Mr. Altmeyer.

Mr. TERRY. According to Mr. Altmeyer, as has been stated, the cost will be from $45,000,000 to $110,000,000.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Above what the present bill will cost?

Mr. TERRY. No; above what the present law now in effect

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman's substitute amendment proposes to increase the Federal contribution to two-thirds, up to $15. Would the gentleman then favor the law's being administered by the Federal Government, rather than by the State, since the Federal Government would be putting up the money?

Mr. TERRY. I believe the Federal Government can very well afford to pay two for one in the first $15 bracket, and it would not be putting up all of the money in any event.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I vield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Does the gentleman not believe that what I will call the machinery of this law and the operation of it ought to be in the hands of the States, the expense of it ought to be largely on the Federal Government; in other words, Federal contribution without Federal control? In schooling work I favor Federal contribution to equalize educational opportunity, and in this matter I want to equalize social security.

Mr. TERRY. I believe we should have a basic minimum amount that is equal all over the United States and then let the individual States add to that such further amounts as they feel they can afford. It does not seem fair to me that the people in the poorer States should get only $4 or $5 a month while those in the richer States get from $20 to $32, as in California.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. May I ask the gentleman whether he can assure me that the State of Arkansas will pay a little above that first $15 bracket, because if it will not, then I am absolutely opposed to any such amendment at this time.

Mr. TERRY. At the present time Arkansas is paying $6.15 per month to the old people. California, which pays the largest pension, is paying $32.46. Of this amount, of course, the Federal Government pays $15. In other words. the United States is paying California five times as much as it is paying Arkansas.

As stated in the remarks I made on this subject yesterday in the general debate, the great disparity that exists between the amounts paid for old-age assistance by the poorer States and their more fortunate sister States is not because the poorer States desire to give their old people inadequate assistance, it is because the poorer States have not the taxable wealth on which to base a larger proportion of contribution. In my State we have tapped all sources of revenue and still we compare unfavorably with the national average. We have a State income tax, a privilege tax, a sales tax, a personal-property tax-tangible and intangible-and many others. Our real-estate tax rate is nearly three times that of the District of Columbia. Our cigarette and gas taxes are among the highest in the country.

No; it is not because we are unwilling to tax ourselves to provide social services for our people. The wealth is not there. The per capita income of the United States is $432. That of the District of Columbia is $962—the highest in the country. That of New York, I am informed, is over $700. The per capita of Arkansas is $182. That tells the story.

Arkansas is not the only State that cannot compare with the national average in the amount it provides for old-age assistance. There are nine States that provide below $10.50. The national average of all the States is $19.27. Of what avail does it do the old people of the country for the Ways and Means Committee to raise the old-age assistance from $30 to $40, when the States, with all the pressure that is on them, cannot come within $10 of averaging up to the $30 now set by the social-security law? It is truly an empty gesture.

The adoption of my amendment only means that of the first $15 the Government will pay $2 for $1 put up by the State. It is a very small increase, but it will be a godsend to those old people who are receiving a miserable pittance of $4 or $5 or $6 a month.

It has been suggested by those opposed to this amendment that its adoption will cause the Townsend plan advocates to redouble their efforts. I say to you that unless you do liberalize the present assistance to some degree, at least, you are giving aid and encouragement to those persons whave made a very lucrative living by dangling before the eyes of the old people of our country the will-o'-the-wisp of the $200 per month plan.

I urge the adoption of my amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I am about to make and the other statement I made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is equally as objectionable in its major point as the Colmer amendment, because it abandons the 50-50 ratio of contribution for old-age pensions. If you can go from 50-50 to two-thirds, by the Federal Government paying two-thirds of the pension, then why will they not come back and say, "Take over three-fourths of the load"? And you can take it as a fact that if you assume three-fourths of the burden you will have the same argument to take over the entire burden, and that is exactly where we would be heading. It is admitted that this amendment will place an additional burden on the Treasury of somewhere between $45,000,000 and $100,000,000 a year.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DOUGHTON. No; I regret I do not have the time.

If you keep piling up authorizations, while I have no threat from the President of the United States, I know exactly how he feels about this. He believes, first, that it should not be made, but if it is made, it is incumbent on the Congress to provide the increased revenue that will be necessary to defray the expense. We go on here day after day and month after month creating authorizations and providing no tax whereby we can take care of these authorizations. Then we criticize the administration for throwing the Budget out of balance when we are responsible ourselves for its being out of balance.

Mr. Chairman, if we vote for this amendment, there is one thing it is our duty to do and that is to remain here and write a tax bill, or increase the tax bill we will soon bring out, sufficient to raise the amount of money that this will authorize, and where would the gentleman from Mississippi or the gentleman from Arkansas propose we get this money? Would you favor a sales tax?

Mr. TERRY. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will tell him. I would just cut off about one-half of one of these $100,000,000 battleships, and then you would have the money.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman well knows that the Congress would not do that, and therefore the gentleman is suggesting an impossible remedy. The gentleman knows the House would not do it; the Congress would not do it, and the President would not stand for it.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am sorry I have not the time to yield.

Mr. Chairman, somebody should speak for the Federal taxpayers. We are now called upon to write a revenue bill whereby we will lighten taxes on business in order that employment may be increased and the unemployment burden lightened, and yet we come in here and propose amendments that would increase the burden of taxation.

Another thing is that when we freeze the pay-roll taxes at 1 percent for 3 years and try to save the business tax-payers of the country money in order to promote business, then it is proposed to add to the burdens of the Treasury a large additional amount without making any provision whatever to take care of it.

There is one of two things you may expect, if we add to this bill enormously, as this proposed amendment would do; that is to raise additional revenue and increase our taxes or you may expect to see the bill vetoed. I do not speak for the President, but knowing his feelings as I do, I have no doubt but what that would happen, and there is also no doubt that if we increase the tax burden we have got to do something to take care of that burden, because it is our duty and our responsibility. Under the present bill the Federal Government has gone a long way, considering its fiscal condition, in assisting States in providing for aged needy people, and if this is not reasonably done, it will be the fault of the States and not the Federal Government. Also please remember the liberal aid given by the Federal Government to needy crippled children, the blind, and other generous and liberal provisions of the bill which I do not now have time to mention.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and the substitute therefor close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion] for 4 minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, we have before us H. R. 6635, which proposes to amend in a number of respects the Social Security Act of 1935. Under the present Social Security Act the Federal Government matches dollar for dollar the amount put up by the States to pay needy persons 65 years of age and over up to a maximum of $15 paid by the Federal Government; that is to say, if any State puts up as much as $15 the Federal Government will match the State's money with $15 and enable any needy person 65 years of age or over to receive $30 per month, but if a State puts up only $4 the Federal Government will put up only $4, making a total of $8 per month.

Section 3 of title I of the bill before us provides that the Federal Government will increase its maximum from $15 to $20 per month, providing, of course, the State will put up as much as $20 per month. The State of California up until this time is the only State of the 48 States that has matched the Federal Government's maximum of $15 and paid $30 a month pensions to needy people 65 years of age or over. All the other States have failed to match the full amount of $15, the maximum contribution by the Federal Government. According to the records of the Social Security Board, Kentucky has paid an average of $8.69; one-half of this was paid by the Federal Government. Georgia has paid $8.62, Mississippi $7.02, South Carolina $7.61, and Arkansas $6.11.

Under the social-security law it is up to the legislature of each State to fix the terms and conditions, the maximum age, and the maximum amount that the State will match of Federal funds. The Kentucky Legislature fixed the maximum that Kentucky would put up for any needy old person 65 years of age and over at the sum of $7.50 a month. If Kentucky should pay the maximum amount of $7.50 a month, the Federal Government would then pay only $7.50 a month, making a total of $15 per month in all, but as we have pointed out on an average the needy old people of Kentucky have been receiving and are receiving only $8.69 a month.

This is not all of the sad story of the needy old people of Kentucky. Nearly 90,000 of needy old people have made application for pensions, but only about 45,000 have been granted pensions, and these have received on an average only $8.69 a month. Those in charge of the old-age pensions in Kentucky have advised me, as well as others, that they are unable to pay many needy old persons any pension because sufficient funds have not been provided by the State of Kentucky for that purpose. We have had and still have a Democratic administration in Kentucky with a large majority of the State legislature made up of Democrats ever since the Federal Social Security Act was passed in 1935. It was the Democratic legislature and Democratic administration in Kentucky that fixed the maximum Kentucky contribution at not more than $7.50 per month and made it impossible for any needy old person in Kentucky to receive in all from the State and Federal Government more than $15 per month. The Republicans in the House and Senate of the Kentucky Legislature offered amendments fixing the maximum to be put up by the State of Kentucky at $15 instead of $7.50 per month, and if this amendment had been adopted, it then would have been possible for the needy old people of Kentucky 65 years of age or over to receive a pension of $30 a month. Each and every Republican in the House and Senate voted for this amendment, but the Democrats with their big majority defeated this salutary amendment. With the Kentucky law as it is, the amendment in the bill before us increasing the Federal contribution from $15 to $20 a month will mean absolutely nothing except a snare and illusion to needy old people of Kentucky and practically every State in the Union except California. Kentucky is in the small group of States paying the smallest amount of old-age pensions.

The President and his administration have stated time and again during the last year or so that old-age pensions throughout the Nation should be and would be liberalized at this session of Congress. The President and his administration were opposed to the Townsend plan. They insisted an adequate old-age pension would be met by liberalization of the Social Security Act that would come up in a few days and which is now before us, and they insisted that this act would be amended so that the needy old people of the country would receive pensions more in keeping with their needs.

The needy old people of America will find that this amendment will not add one dime to their old-age pensions unless it is in a State like California that has already matched the maximum amount of $15 now being put up by the Federal Government.

I FAVOR THE WOODRUFF AMENDMENT

We now have before us for our immediate consideration the amendment offered to this bill by our colleague, Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. He is one of the ablest men on the Ways and Means Committee and is chairman of the Republican caucus of the House. He comes from one of the so-called rich States of the Union. I am very much in favor of his amendment, because it provides—

First. That the Federal Government will match two for one to provide assistance and pensions for needy old people 60 years of age or over. The Government now puts up dollar for dollar. Under the Woodruff amendment the Federal Government is authorized to put up as much as $30 if the States put up as much as $15, making $45 in all.

This amendment would benefit the needy old people in each and all of the States of the Union. Under the Woodruff amendment, if Kentucky did not change its maximum of $7.50 a month and would put up $7.50 the Federal Government would meet the $7.50 with $15, making $22.50 in all, and if the State of Kentucky would put up $10 it would be necessary for the Federal Government to put up $20, making $30 in all for each needy person 60 years of age or over. In other words, the Federal Government would match two for 1 instead of 1 for 1 for old-age pensions in each and all of the 48 States. I do not believe that we can claim we are making adequate provisions for the needy old people unless they are allowed at least $30 per month.

When the President's social-security bill was up for consideration in the House in 1935, I offered an amendment that provided that the Federal Government would pay an adequate old-age pension to each and every person 60 years of age or over, to each and every needy person and to each and every permanently and totally disabled person.

I am very happy to have an opportunity to speak and vote for the Woodruff amendment. The administration and its leaders, as well as some of the Members from the so-called rich States of the Union, are opposed to the Woodruff amendment, and, because of the big majority that the administration has in the House, they may be able to defeat it. It is claimed by them that the Woodruff amendment would impose hardships on the rich States to aid the poor States. We must bear in mind that the so-called poor States produce the raw materials in the way of timber, coal, farm products, and so forth. These go to the so-called rich States for processing and distribution. The producers of raw materials as a rule have far less income than those who process and distribute the finished product and sell them to the so-called poor States at a great profit.

I introduced and had charge of the Federal Aid Road Act of November 9, 1921. The so-called rich States opposed the Federal aid road bill. They claimed it would impose a burden on the rich States in favor of the so-called poor States. The Federal aid road bill provided for the distribution of money to the States on a basis to area, population, and road mileage. The Members of the House from the rich States insisted that another element should be considered-wealth-and that the road money should be distributed on the basis of wealth, population, area, and mileage. Congress refused to accept wealth in the distribution of the road money. The trouble then with the country was that roads were being built in the rich States and in the rich communities of the poor States while the road building lagged in the poor States and in less-favored communities. Under the Federal aid road law roads were built through the poor States and through the poor communities of the poor States, and all of this proved to be a great blessing to the Nation as a whole. In a few years the Members of the House and Senate from the rich States ceased their opposition to the road-bill program and now no one insists that wealth should be one of the elements in the distribution of the Federal aid road money.

Whatever money is spent for old-age pensions in the poor States will increase the purchasing power of the people in those States and it will return to the rich States in increased business. The rich States absorb most of the money and income of the poor States. In the end it will prove to be a blessing as did the Federal aid road law. The old-age pension matter will never be settled until it is settled right, and in my opinion, some day if not now the principle embodied in the Woodruff amendment will be adopted. The failure to meet this problem and the failure to provide adequate pensions for needy old people of the Nation will increase the chances for such proposals such as the Townsend plan and other plans. If we are going to have old-age pensions let them be adequate, fair, just, and reasonable.

RURAL SECTIONS DISCRIMINATED AGAINST

Under the Social Security Act providing for an old-age insurance annuity we will begin in 1940 to pay old-age annuities to persons 65 years of age or over. I refer to persons who have been employed and whose wages as well as the employers have been taxed to provide a fund for this old-age: insurance. These people will not receive old-age pensions. They will receive old-age annuities. About 45,000,000 workers in the United States had issued to them Social Security cards and they pay a tax out of their wages and their employers pay a like tax to provide a fund out of which to pay these annuities after the person has reached 65 years of age and over. These persons are largely employed in the so-called rich States in the various branches of industry, commerce, processing agricultural products and other raw These taxes paid by the workers and their emmaterials. ployers are added to the cost of the products and all of us must pay these taxes to a large extent. The people in the rural sections, the farm workers, domestic workers, and so forth, living in the rural sections, do not come under this oldage insurance provision of the Social Security Act. Their only hope of relief is under the so-called old-age pension.

The wife as well as the widow and children in case of the death of the husband will secure a pension under these oldage annuities, and they will receive a much larger pension and up to $85 per month under these old-age annuities. And Congress must provide a reasonable, fair, and adequate pension for the needy old people who do not and cannot come under the old-age insurance. Old-age insurance would not begin until 1942, but this bill amends the act of 1935 and authorized these payments to begin 2 years earlier, January 1, 1940, and it greatly increases the annuities that will be received by those workers who have reached the age of 65 and provides annuities for the wife after she reaches 65 and provides annuities for the children on the death of the parent, but in my opinion this bill will not benefit the needy old people who do not come under the old-age insurance plan. If they are to receive more liberal pensions, we must adopt something like the Woodruff amendment and let the Government put up two for one as provided in the Woodruff amendment.

I am sure if the Woodruff amendment was adopted a great majority of the States would soon put up at least $10 a month and enable each needy old person to receive at least $30 per month and, of course, some States would put up $15 and this would give the needy old people of such States $45

DESIRABLE PROVISIONS

I shall vote for the bill as a whole. It has a number of very desirable features. The tax on the employee and employer would remain at 1 percent under this bill. That will mean a great saving to the workers and their employers. There have been collected by the Government from these pay-roll taxes from the workers and employers many more times in dollars than have been paid out in benefits. These pay-roll taxes should be used for the purposes for which they were intended and that is to provide annuities or pensions for workers who retire after they are 65 years of age and for their wives, widows, and children.

This bill also provides that the payment of old-age annuities begin on January 1, 1940, instead of 1942, as provided in the act of 1935. This bill also provides for an increase of the Federal contribution to aid the States in taking care of their needy blind, but, of course, the States would have to match this money. Kentucky has not yet matched the amount set up for needy widows and their children and needy blind people provided in the act of 1935, and I am afraid the increase in this measure will not help the needy widows and the needy blind in Kentucky.

The needy crippled people of the Nation must not be overlooked by the Federal Government or by the States. The Federal Government and the States should see to it that the needy old people, the needy blind, the needy disabled, and needy widows and their orphan children are given just, adequate, and fair consideration; and then the Federal Government and the States should encourage those who are younger and able to work to start things moving in this country in agriculture, industry, and commerce so that we may have pay rolls to take the place of relief rolls.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

A few days ago the Townsend plan was before us for consideration. I did not feel that the Townsend plan was feasible. Dr. Townsend in his own testimony before the committee recently stated that need or necessity should not be considered. In other words, every person 60 years of age or over, rich or poor, in need or in plenty, should receive the pension, and under his plan 12,000,000 people in the United States would be eligible for the pension. His idea was that we should start with $200 a month for each person 60 years of age and over and this sum would likely go to $300 a month within 5 years. His plan would mean that a husband and wife over 60 years of age, whether poor or rich, could and would receive $400 to $600 a month if they applied for same. If 12,000,000 who would be eligible applied for this pension it would cost the Government each year over $28,000,000,000, and if it were increased to $300 a month, as Dr. Townsend planned, it would cost the Federal Government over $43,000,-000,000 annually, and at $200 a month there would have to be raised annually in the State of Kentucky $532,000,000.

Last year the Federal Government collected in all in the ways of revenues and taxes from the American people about $6,000,000,000, and we collected in taxes for all purposes to operate the State government of Kentucky-salaries, schools, roads, and for every other purpose-about $25,000,000. Under the Townsend plan we would have increased the taxes for old-age pensions alone by the Federal Government nearly five times, and the taxes paid by the people of Kentucky more than 20 times.

Dr. Townsend's plan to raise these enormous sums in taxes was to levy income, consumers', and sales taxes. I should like to see the old people of this Nation receive that sum of money. It would soon enable me to retire and quit work.

But it seems to me to be impracticable and unworkable. I then favored, and still favor a pension that is fair, just, and reasonable, and one that the taxpayers are able to meet. The American Federation of Labor, the railroad brotherhoods and other labor organizations, and the farm organizations of the country strongly opposed the Townsend plan because the big part of these consumers' taxes and sales taxes would be paid by the working people and the common people. I think it would take at least 20 percent of their income and wages to meet these taxes. I believe, however, that the Woodruff amendment is feasible and workable and will insure a fair, adequate, and reasonable old-age pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, during the debate under the 5-minute rule we often vote on amendments that we do not understand. So I am taking the liberty of suggesting to the membership of the House that they turn to page 2419 of the Appendix of the RECORD of June 6, if they are interested in knowing the exact wording of the Terry amendment, which is now up for a vote. It is printed there in the Appendix of the RECORD at page 2419. The amendment, in simple language, does this: The Federal Government contributes $2 to the State's $1 for the first $15. After that the matching is on a 50-50 basis. If the State puts up $5, the Federal Government would put up $10, making the total pension $15. If the State puts up $10, the Federal Government would put up $15, making the total $25 up to $40, the maximum pension provided under the bill as favored by the committee. If $40 were paid, the State would pay $17.50 and the Federal Government $22.50. This would change the contribution on the maximum pension only 10 percent and reduce it from a 50-50 matching proposition to a 60-40 on the maximum, and here is what it would accomplish. We have 12 States now paying a pension of $10 or less. That is the combined pension. These States say that they cannot raise more money. At the same time they are Southern States, where the standard of living and the cost of living may not be so high. So the adoption of this two-for-one proposition up to $15 would mean that these States that are now suffering from these wholly inadequate pensions would be able to make a payment of $15 to their pensioners. As I read to the House during the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], the cost of this amendment would be between $45,000,000 and $110,000,000. This is the opinion of the Social Security Board in writing to me on this certain amendment. Forty-five million dollars would be the cost if the present rules were not increased. That is not a tremendous burden on the Budget of the United States. The present Budget for old-age pensions is $225,000,000. This amendment when put into effect would raise the Federal Budget on old-age pensions to $275,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. DISNEY. The gentleman means that the immediate rise in the cost would be from $45,000,000 to $110,000.000, does he not? He does not mean to tell the House that would be the final cost of this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Barrs] for 4 minutes.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, those of us who have for some years given thought and study to questions of taxation, particularly in our own States, are somewhat surprised at the effort being made this afternoon to attempt to load unto other States of the Union already suffering from tremendous tax burdens, a responsibility that is entirely their own.

A short time ago the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee yielded to me for a few moments so I could give information to its members relative to the devious ways that some of our States of the Union are tax-exempting their own residents, their industrial establishments, and other kinds of property. It is particularly of interest to know that only a few days ago I cut this article from a magazine advertising the State of Louisiana, that very State some of whose Members were today advocating a larger percentage of national contribution in order, evidently, to evade their just share of the cost of this burden.

Among other things, the Governor says in this article:

Louisiana today is the most prosperous State of the Union. If you come as a home seeker you know already that our lands are fertile, that there is a $1,000 exemption on homesteads from all property taxes; that all livestock in the State is tax free; that new homes are tax exempt for 3 years, and new industries for 10 years.

So much for the State of Louisiana. Let us go to Arkansas, the State from which come some of the Members advocating higher Federal contributions. We find in the report that I have here, entitled "Homestead Valuation Survey," by the commissioner of education in the State of Arkansas, pertinent comments about the exemption of homesteads from local taxation. Among other things, he said in this report that:

The exemption of homesteads up to $1,000 will mean a loss in revenue to the State of Arkansas of $598,000.

May I quote again from the National Municipal Review, in the case of Mississippi, whose Representatives also advocate this legislation, and where it went on to say:

MISSISSIPPI PROVIDES TAX-FREE HOMES—150,000 HOME OWNERS CLAIM EXEMPTION UNDER NEW HOMESTEAD LAWS; PROGRAM TO COST STATE OVER THREE AND A HALF MILLION DOLLARS ANNUALLY

Although the legislature did not adopt the entire program of the Governor, it passed 10 bills relating to homestead exemptions, and as a result of this legislation Mississippi has gone a long way toward providing tax-free homes.

It is very obvious that these States are attempting by such exemptions on homesteads and manufacturing plants as well to shift their own burden to other States of the Union. Not only have many industries left parts of the country to go into tax-exempt areas, but many of the wealthiest taxpayers have taken up domicile in States where there are no income-tax laws. This is purely for the purpose of evading their just share of the cost of government.

Representatives of these States are today pleading for the adoption of this amendment seeking a larger Federal contribution toward the cost of their old-age assistance, and it is of special interest to note that in these very States the legislatures have refused to enact sufficient tax laws that would raise needed revenue sufficient to pay higher old-age pensions. Only 13 States now have no income-tax laws.

There is rapidly growing up in this country a group of taxdodging States, States that are trying to shift the burden which is rightfully theirs onto other States.

The argument made for this proposal is that there are certain States which are unable to make old-age assistance payments. I enclose two tables showing the old-age assistance payments in the States as compared with the per capita income by States. This indicates that it is not so much a question of inability to pay as it is unwillingness to pay.

In the interest of those States from which have migrated a large number of industries to these tax-exempt areas, and who are finding the tax burden and unemployment problem so pronounced, I feel in the interest of justice and equity that the amendment should be defeated. Surely these States that have tax-exempt provisions can well afford to shoulder their just share of the cost of old-age assistance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] for 3 minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe any Member of this House can accuse me of being illiberal. However, I do not propose to vote for any reactionary measure simply because its proponents, who have never been on the liberal side of any fence, call it liberal. I do think the time has come when we must pause and recognize that this type of an amendment places on the more humanitarian and progressive States a greater burden and permits the landed aristocracy and the new industrialism of other States to dodge their responsibility toward the aged of those States.

A great deal has been said here about New York by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Robsion]. Does the gentleman realize that in New York we are almost taxed to death? Aside from a real-estate tax and a Federal and State income tax, in various cities we have personal-property taxes, sales taxes of every kind; taxes on every single article. New York cares not only for the unemployables but for many unemployed employables because of Congressmen who voted to cut appropriations for W. P. A. New York is engaged in many aspects of welfare legislation. Pass amendments of this type and you add an additional burden on New York and other States like it. I say that in this matter of pensions, the States must assume their responsibility. I say it is grossly unfair and unjust to load on us an extra load so that various States can get out from under. The several States can put up their required share. They do not tax in order to bring down to their States industries which seek cheap labor and seek to dodge the taxes necessary to carry the benefits of social welfare legislation to the people of our States. Let the legislatures of those States whose Representatives here are sponsoring these 4-to-1 and 2-to-1 amendments assume their just responsibilities toward the people of their States; let them levy the necessary taxes and let them cease making their States havens for tax dodgers and industrialists who seek to escape their social obligations.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Excuse me; not just now.

When it is said that this bill is a snare and a delusion, that the old people are not going to get an additional penny, I say that the responsibility for the old people not getting an additional penny rests entirely on the States in which they reside. Let those States be fair with the United States Government, let them raise their required share, and their old people will get additional pensions. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. Hinshaw] for 2 minutes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I have made bold to criticize this act. I have done so partly because it does not provide taxes to support the aged assistance program that is authorized in the act. I am amazed that of all committees, the Ways and Means Committee should bring out a bill that is not self-supporting.

The able chairman of the committee has even asked someone to suggest a tax to support this portion of the bill. I humbly offer to him and to the members of the committee that if they will put much the same kind of tax that is here levied against the one-third of the people covered by title II on the balance of the people, they will more than adequately support the old-age assistance program contained in this bill. They had an opportunity to work out such a bill when they failed to perfect H. R. 6466, and the Rules Committee chose to send us that bill under a gag rule so that it could not be amended. I claim that some such tax program as that offered in H. R. 6466, with suitable amendments, or even the tax program that is offered in this bill for a certain one-third of the people, if applied to everyone equitably, would adequately support the old-age assistance section and permit of liberalization to boot.

Mr. Chairman, we are in a great confusion here. We talk about social-security taxes when we mean compulsory old-age insurance premiums. I see no essential difference between these payments and those payments many of us made for war-risk insurance. If the majority of our people believe that all of the people should be compelled to take out old-age risk insurance so that they will not become public charges if and when they reach old age, then the people have a right to so order in a democracy. We have already done so, but for one-third of our people only.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, this program of old-age risk insurance should be self-supporting and should not be considered as a part of the Federal Budget. Here we call it a tax for social security, but it is no more a tax than are the millions of insurance premiums that are regularly paid on the millions of ordinary life-insurance policies in force in this country. We fight against paying taxes, but we work to pay insurance premiums. This pending act would make princes of one-third of our people and paupers of all but a fortunate small percent of the other two-thirds. It contains some gross inequities and is ponderous and cumbersome in its administration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Colmer] for 3 minutes.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I am just as much interested in this amendment as I was in the amendment that I sponsored a moment ago. In fact, I consider it my amendment and the amendment of those of us who are interested in liberalizing this pension.

Now, it has been pointed out repeatedly today that this bill that is brought here does not liberalize the pensions of these aged people, because there is only one State in the Union that is now matching the $15 that the Government offers. I just want to say in these 3 minutes you are either going to pass this liberalizing amendment or you are not going to pass anything. If you are not going to pass anything. If you are not going to pass anything to the aged needy people and the country at large, and say that this Congress is not in favor of increasing the pensions to the aged needy.

I was amazed that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Marcantonio], a man who would probably vote one hundred billions for the Workers Alliance, for the W. P. A., should get up here and oppose this proposition of 2 to 1 for these aged people.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I am sorry, I have only a few minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman mentioned my name.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield.

Mr. Chairman, either we are going to liberalize this bill with this amendment and give these people something, or we leave the question entirely unsettled and just put off the issue to a later time. I was not astonished at the action of the gentleman on the other side, he was running true to form; nor was I astonished when the minority defeated the amendment on the 4-to-1 proposal, but let me say to Republicans and Democrats alike that if you do not want to vote for this amendment, then you are in effect saying to the aged people that you are not going to give them anything. Oh, yes; there is another course, there is another body at the other end of the Capitol. When the bill gets over there it will be liberalized, but this is your test vote. We ask you to vote for it.

Mr. Chairman, we have made the best fight that we knew how to make in an effort to get a more liberal pension for the aged needy. I regret that many who had signified their desire to support this amendment are not here. I regret that under the rules of the House we are unable to get a record vote on this amendment and on the amendment which I offered and which was defeated on a teller vote. I was particularly disappointed in our colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle. There is no question but that, with few exceptions, they voted against the liberalizing amendment which we offered a few minutes ago. There is also no question but that the majority of the Democrats voted for it. Had our Republican friends come through as we expected them to do, this amendment would have been adopted. I hope that those who oppose these efforts which we are making to liberalize these pensions will not go before the country next year and tell the people that they favor an adequate old-age pension.

Let me say in conclusion to my colleagues that this is the last stand. If you really favor a liberalization of the bill which the committee has reported, and which we have pointed out repeatedly means nothing because only one State is now matching the $15 provision, then this is your opportunity to liberalize it. We have reason to believe that the Senate will liberalize the bill if we do not. Why should we not do so in the first instance? I appeal to you in the name of the thousands of the aged needy throughout the country, and particularly in our section, to support this amendment and no longer turn a deaf ear to the pleas of these aged needy people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired, all time on this amendment has expired.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TERRY. As I understand it the first vote will be on my amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Chair was about to put the question.

The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TERRY) there were-ayes 65, noes 131.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Woodruff].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Woodruff) there were—ayes 79, noes 142.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Keller: On page 3, in line 9, strike out "one-half" and insert "two-thirds"; in line 15, strike out "5 percent" and insert "4 percent."

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is practically the same amendment we just voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. In order for the point of order to be sustained the amendment would have to be identical to one which has already been voted on. This amendment is not

The point of order is overruled.

The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that we are going from one extreme to another. At the present time we ought to make progress slowly but surely. There is a great deal of merit in the 4-to-1 proposed which was rejected. The idea behind it was not wrong, but the extent of the proportion was wrong.

When the proposal of Federal old-age pensions first came up it was my great pleasure and honor to have introduced the original bill, which was the basis of the old-age assistance features of our social-security law. The present oldage assistance feature was put into the social-security law at that time. First I proposed a national old-age pension. On rewriting the bill I proposed that the contribution as between the Federal Government and the State governments should be 3 to 1, 3 parts being contributed by the Federal Government and 1 part by the States. That is exactly the proportion in Canada between the contribution of the Dominion Government and the provinces. After arguing the question with the President he finally insisted that we ought to start out on an even basis. I was, of course, compelled to give in to that, although I still held to my own opinion that there ought to be a difference.

We have tried out the 50-50 plan and we have found that the 50-50 plan does not give the relief we had a right to expect and which we hoped it would give when we wrote it into the law. Our own experience should teach us that there is a way of doing this. In foreign countries what happened was that they started at a certain rate of pension and a certain age, almost invariably 65, the same as we did. Little by little the pension was increased to what each country considered a normal amount. As time ran along they began to reduce the age limit from 65 to 62, and 60, and finally to 58 years. That is exactly the process that we probably will go through in this country.

That is the rational process, but we ought not to overlook the fact that we ought to be ready at the present time for the Federal Government to assume a larger proportion than one-half, for the simple reason that when this Government was first instituted the amount of money raised through real-estate taxes amounted to about 90 percent of the entire revenues of Government. At the present time it amounts to less than 15 percent; in other words, it has become a matter of taxing income. In Illinois as well as in other States the people are suffering from this mistake. For the purpose of providing our half of the old-age assistance we are taxing our property, the homes of people who are not able to pay these taxes. When you do that you are not going to get the right kind and the right distribution on the old-age pension. It is for this reason, in my judgment, that we ought to pass a 2-to-1 provision at the present time: then profit by that experience and see where we can go. Because the figures presently indicate that we should ultimately arrive at $50 a month instead of $40; but the $40 is a step forward. We ought to make it 2 to 1 instead of 1 to 1, as at present.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr.

This amendment is substantially the same as the one just voted down.

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Dirksen: Page 2, line 20, after the word "assistance", strike out the semicolon, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the term 'resources' shall not be deemed to include any sum or amount which, in the opinion of the State or any instrumentality thereof, might be obtained from children or relatives."

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield before he starts?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from California. Mr. BUCK. Does the gentleman's amendment read "shall not be deemed to include any sum or amounts received from

Mr. DIRKSEN. It reads "That the term 'resources' shall not be deemed to include any sum or amount which in the opinion of the State or any instrumentality thereof might be obtained from children or relatives."

Mr. BUCK. Suppose allowances were made under other titles of this act?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They would have to be amended if this is adopted, in accordance with the substance of my amendment. Let me explain it first before my time is exhausted.

Mr. BUCK. I am trying to really understand what the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will permit, I will explain it.

Mr. Chairman, let me take a hypothetical case. Let us assume that under the old-age assistance act of the State of Illinois one makes written application for old-age assistance. Normally he might be entitled to $30 a month. That application goes to an investigator or to a social worker. social worker calls on the applicant and after going into the matter of income and resources will say: "Have you any children?" "Yes, two." "Sons or daughters?" "Two sons." "Who are they and where do they work? Are they married or are they single?" "Both of them are married. Both have families. Both have children." "Where do they work?" "One works in a canning factory, the other works in a shoe factory." "How much money do they earn in a week?" "Each one of them receives approximately $25 per week." Now, then, if in the judgment of that investigator, which is affirmed by the old-age assistance division, the State decides that each one of these married sons should or could contribute $2, $3, or $5 per month out of the pay check, that amount of money is going to be taken from the potential old-age assistance which will be given to the aged person. It is what is known in the State of Illinois as the relative clause. They have it also in New York and other States.

Mr. Chairman, it is one of those griping and distasteful things to the aged people of the country that sometimes makes this seem like bitter charity. There are many aged fathers and mothers who do not want to depend upon their sons and daughters, who have their own families and who have gone through lean years since 1929; yet, if in the opinion of the States and if in the opinion of the Attorney General, or if the old-age assistance division said that such son or daughter could contribute, then the amount of pension is going to be diminished by the sum total of that contribution

The eligibility provision in our law in Illinois has a qualification for old-age assistance:

Has no children who in the opinion of the State department or the attorney general are legally responsible for the applicant's support.

Are we asking families to take care of the old-age assistance, or are we making this a matter for the States and for the Federal Government? I say it is a very unhappy provision that has crept into many State laws, and it has caused distaste everywhere among the aged. It seems to me one of the things we can do is to make certain that the word "resource" is qualified so that no case worker, no investigator, no attorney general, will be able to say that this son or daughter, whether they can afford it or not, could contribute $2 or $3 or $5 toward the assistance of an aged person and then reduce the proposed amount by that much.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. Does not the gentleman think that his own State, if it wants to have a provision of that kind in its law with respect to money that that State pays out, ought to have a right to have it?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman from Tenpessee that it is stated in the act:

Effective July 1, 1941, the State act must provide * * * that the State agency in determining need shall take into consideration income and resources.

What is a resource? Is it something that a son or daughter can contribute? Are you going to leave it as vague as that? We ought to have it stated definitely. It ought to be clarified. The amendment I have offered should be adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

May I call to the attention of the Committee that the other income and resources that are to be taken into consideration are specifically stated to be those of the individual claiming old-age assistance, and that does not include. in my opinion, any resources that his son or daughter or anyone else might have. If this statement will clarify the record for the benefit of the Illinois officials who administer their old-age law, I am very happy to make it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman it is going to be a matter of administrative interpretation, and how does the gentleman know or how do I know what they will say down in Springfield, Ill., or what they will say down in the Social Security Board as to what constitutes a resource?

Mr. BUCK. How can they go back of the language in this bill, if it becomes law, which states that the State agency shall take into consideration-I quote:

Any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-

His children are certainly not claiming old-age assistance. Mr. DIRKSEN. The fact is that this was not in the original law. Why should it be put in now?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman from Illinois entirely misses the point involved in this provision in the bill. Under the present law old-age benefits under title II do not come into effect until 1942. Under these amendments those benefits are moved up and come into effect in 1940. Could the gentleman from Illinois or anybody else take the position that a person receiving an old-age benefit or annuity should also be entitled to an old-age pension or old-age assistance? The gentleman entirely misses the point with respect to the provision of the bill about which he is speaking.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Illinois has not missed the point. Do not be misled on that.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield. Mr. POAGE. May I say to the gentleman that this is the point I was raising yesterday, and that while clearly the point stated by the gentleman from Tennessee is well taken, the experience of my State, which had in its statute almost exactly word for word the provision this bill has in it, was that the investigators and supervisors from the Social Security Board at Washington enforced on our State the interpretation of a statute almost word for word like this that kept every person off the roll who had a child who had any means of self-support whatever.

Mr. BUCK. Yes; but I may say to the gentleman from Texas that here we are laying down a standard for the State to live up to, and in very definite words. The Social Security Board is not going to be involved in a question of interpretation of a State law. The "resources" are those of the old-age individual claiming assistance. If he can draw a benefit under title II, we propose it be taken into consideration.

Mr. POAGE. The State statute was almost exactly word for word what you are attempting to lay down here, and the Social Security Board has already interpreted that provision; it has done it already in the State of Texas, and I am sure it has in other States.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. May I say to the gentleman and the Committee that this exact question arose in the State of Washington last January.

Mr. BUCK. Yes; but it arose not under a Federal statute. Mr. MAGNUSON. I was going to sustain the gentleman's point. The Supreme Court knocked out all our old-age pension laws. The Social Security Board ruled that the question of what resources should be taken into consideration was entirely a matter for the State and that it was not mandatory to receive the Federal grant that children support the aged people.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman for the contribution. It was very valuable.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PATMAN). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Are we voting on the amendment or the motion to close debate?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, are we voting on the motion to close debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The question was on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to close debate on the pending amendment. The Chair put the question, and the motion was agreed to.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania, Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Bradley of Pennsylvania: On page 2, line 9, after the word "administration", strike out "other than those relating to selections, tenure of office, and compensation of personnel" and insert "including a civil-service merit system for employees, who shall be dismissed for cause only, and who shall have the right of appeal to the court or courts having jurisdiction in their respective States: Provided also, That in the event of a necessary curtailment of personnel no new employees shall be engaged in a similar classification until after those dismissed under such curtailment order shall be restored to duty, or shall have, in writing, declined such reinstatement."

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, when this Congress enacted the social-security law it inaugurated a great humanitarian experiment. I think everyone concedes that that legislation and this new legislation are desirable, but I feel that every man in this House should wish to place safeguards around the administration of such legislation, not only by the Federal Government but by the States, to the end that we will have an efficient and a just administration of the law.

We have heard on the floor of the House many statements regarding the introduction of politics into the administration of the W. P. A. We know that throughout the country in the local administrative forces there has been politics with regard to relief. I think these men and women who receive oldage pensions should be absolutely safeguarded so that they may not be submitted to exploitation on the part of any political machine, no matter of what party.

The Federal Government has established civil service for the employees engaged under the Federal Government. There may be those who say we have no right to interfere with the machinery of the States, but, after all, the Federal Government is contributing up to $20 for every grant that is made by every State and if we do not establish the most rigid safeguards, sooner or later, regardless of what the political aspect may be in any State, we are going to see investigators and supervisors actively engaged in politics, and the social security legislation is going to be brought into discredit.

I hope that everyone who is sincerely interested in the matter of old-age pensions and social security will support this amendment so that we can be sure that the Congress of the United States has provided safeguards, not only in Federal administration, but in the States, because that is where you probably will need it more than you do here in Washington, and I hope the committee will support this amendment to insure an efficient civil service administration that will be free of politics no matter who might wish to bring pressure.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman that I think his amendment is very fine. We know that in the State of Kentucky last year and in the gentleman's own State and in the State of Ohio, as well as in many other States, these employees were used by State political machines, and we ought to prohibit that, because we are paying part of the cost and we ought to make the States put them under a merit system.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Georgia and I am very glad he has made that statement, because I know that everyone in this House knows that, above all others, he is sincerely interested in the civil-service system, and when he feels that this is a desirable amendment I think that should create a good impression upon the other members of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to take just a moment or two to speak in opposition to the pending amendment.

This matter was thoroughly considered by your committee, not only during the consideration of the pending bill but in 1935, during the consideration of the present act. All in the world this means is that the Federal Government will say to the sovereign States of this Union whom they have to employ under their State program. As long as the States put up half of the money to provide these benefits and this assistance, they certainly should have a right to select the personnel and to handle the program in those States.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I know the gentleman does not want to wrongly state the amendment. It does not interfere with the right of the State to select the persons, but simply provides that they must be selected under a system of merit rather than political patronage.

Mr. COOPER. Certainly, the Federal Government says the State may select its personnel, but the State has to select it under a system prescribed or approved by the Federal Government. So what difference or distinction is there in the matter?

This amendment was voted down unanimously by the committee by members on both sides of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bradley]. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Voorhis of California: On page 2, line 20, after the word "assistance", insert "Provided, That whenever such other cash income is less than $360 per year, such fact shall be prima facie proof of need."

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to take a step in the direction of making it possible for such pensions as are paid under this act to be paid to people without compelling those people to go through a virtual pauperism test in order to qualify. In effect the amendment says that if an individual's cash income is less than $360 a year, which certainly is little enough, then that person shall be deemed by the State agency to be eligible.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. This provides that if an individual has less than $360 a year income he shall be eligible?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. BUCK. Suppose he owns $100,000 worth of land from which he does not get any income at all.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. If he has no income, he would not be in very good shape would he? This amendment does not say that the State must under all circumstances make payment to an individual under those circumstances, but it does say that if that person is in receipt of less than $360 income in a year that shall be regarded as prima facie evidence of eligibility on the part of that person. That means really and practically, without quibbling, that a person is not going to be compelled to give a lien on a little home to the county before he can qualify. It means that his sons and daughters, as pointed out previously by the gentleman from Illinois, are not going to be compelled to make a contribution, when they themselves are hard pressed, to the support of this particular individual. It means, in other words, that we are taking a step in the direction of making this what we claim it to be, namely, a payment made because it ought to be made and without the humiliating experience through which people now in many cases are compelled to go.

I feel very strongly on this point because of the experiences that we have had in our own State and in my own congressional district. I feel strongly on it because of what I know has happened in so many cases. For example, I could point to cases where a man and wife, both together, each of whom draws a full pension, are living next door to a person who is holding onto a little home, but who has to give a lien against that home before he can qualify. My State tried to correct that particular situation and now permits real property up to $3,000, I believe, to be owned by an individual without his being made ineligible; but it left a loophole, and that loophole was that it was provided that anybody who was a relative of an individual past 65 might be held responsible for their support, and through that method it has been possible for the same injustice to take place as between two individuals, one of whom receives the pension, while the other is denied on the ground that he has, for illustration, a son in Montana, with four or five children, making a very meager income, who can be asked to contribute-

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Yes.

Mr. POAGE. My State has corrected that, but if this bill goes through without the gentleman's amendment I am sure all the efforts of our legislatures will go for nothing.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I think it will. In regard to people in receipt of payments under title II, it seems to me that if those same people will become eligible to payments under title II in 1940 it is all the more necessary for an amendment of this kind to be adopted. I do not believe that the members of the Ways and Means Committee themselves would want to see a person who had contributed under title II and was getting payment as a result of those contributions receive less than a person who had not contributed and who was receiving old-age assistance. Under this amendment that would be corrected, at least to a certain extent; and if the person received, say, $10 under title II, he would not thereby be disbarred, as they might well be now under certain State laws, from the receipt of any other further consideration under title I.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the pending amendment be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Voorhis of California) there were—ayes 58, noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Taylor of Tennessee: On page 3, line 18, after the word "purpose", strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no State will require any beneficiary under this section as a condition precedent, to convey by deed or otherwise, any property said recipient may possess."

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that up until now this afternoon this Committee has had open season on amendments, but I believe this amendment possesses such outstanding merit that the majority of this body will support it.

In a number of the States, not in all of them by any means, before an old person is granted old-age assistance he is required to convey to the State whatever property he may possess, regardless of the insignificance of the value of such property. That proved to be a very serious deterrent to the old people. I know in my State it has been a deterrent to applicants for old-age assistance. When they come before the welfare board and find that before they can be considered for old-age assistance they must give a lien on the property or convey by deed their little home, in many instances a little hovel with an acre of garden, they simply walk away.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is beneath the dignity of a sovereign State to require, as a condition precedent, that those little homes, those little tracts of land that are worth from $100 to $200, should be conveyed to the State before application for old-age assistance will be granted.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, I yield.

Mr. LEAVY. I am in full accord with what the gentleman has said. To show you how varying the States are now, and how unfair it is, I have the figures for the various States. Twenty-seven States have no provision for recovery; 9 States have permissible recovery; and 15 States absolutely require a recovery.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. That is merely an argument in support of the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. LEAVY. Your amendment would put an end to this sort of thing?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. It would put an end to that sort of racket.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. Is your amendment retroactive? In Minnesota they have a law that puts a lien on the homestead now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I think, if my amendment is adopted, it would cancel all of the liens that have been given as a condition for the granting of old-age assistance.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. I am in full accord with your amendment. You will recall that yesterday I asked the chairman of the committee the question whether or not we could do anything to eliminate that terrible situation where an old man or an old lady had a little home and they could not get a pension unless they gave a lien on that little home to the State, but our chairman of our committee tells us we cannot do anything about it; that that is a matter for the States to determine.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. We certainly can legislate.
Mr. STEFAN. I am going to vote for your amendment.
Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I appreciate the support of the gentleman.

I want to conclude, Mr. Chairman, by saying that I think it is a melancholy commentary that a sovereign State, before it will grant this old-age aid to indigent persons, must require the conveyance of a little home, in many instances perhaps not worth more than $50 or $75. But those old people have a sentimental attachment to their homes, and before they will comply with any such requirement they will walk away and refuse to pursue their application.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Is that not a much more pertinent question to ask in the State legislature than it is here?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Well, I think we ought to do it here. We have an opportunity to do it now. It is a matter that ought not be referred to the States.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Suppose we adopt your amendment and the State could not obtain a lien on the property, then would not the State pass a law saying that those people are not needy, and they never would get any relief?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. But they get no income whatever from these little homes.

Mr. BUCK. But you would not accomplish the purpose you are aiming at, in my opinion.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. If you will adopt my amendment, I will take the consequences.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MILLS of Louisiana. Will it not make the old people more content if your amendment is adopted?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Of course. Naturally, the States would not grant pensions to people who have homes in the nature of mansions. It is only the small homes of practically no value that such an amendment as mine would cover. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee has a very sentimental appeal. The gentleman says it is a "melancholy commentary" upon a State that would do that. Well, I do not want to characterize the great sovereign State of Tennessee as doing something on this occasion which constitutes "a melancholy commentary," but I will agree with the gentleman that I would dislike very much to see such a condition existing in Massachusetts. But we are sitting here as Members of the Congress of the United States. My friend from Tennessee is in effect asking us as Members of Congress to compel his State to do something that his State legislature will not do. His job rests with Tennessee, as I see it, and not with the Congress of the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield gladly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I have repeatedly appealed to the Legislature of Tennessee to repeal this requirement. I will say to the gentleman that as a Tennessean I am sorry that my State has written into its laws, in pursuance of this act of Congress, any such unfortunate provision as that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will not my friend admit that it is a Tennessee problem?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. No; I think it is not.

Mr. McCORMACK. Let us keep in mind the fact, Mr. Chairman, that we have tried to make this law as broad as possible, giving to the States as broad jurisdiction as it is possible to give them to meet the old-age problem payable out of public funds in accordance with their own State conditions. If we start putting this condition in and that condition in, there is no reason in the world why we should not put in every condition that is not attractive or agreeable to every Member of Congress from every one of the 48 States of the Union. I join with my friend in his opinion that the Tennessee law should be changed, but I submit in all reason that we should not change the Tennessee law, or the Massachusetts law, or the New York law, or the Alabama law in Congress; this should be done by the legislatures of the respective States; it is a matter for the several States. My friend should go into Tennessee and mold public opinion, because public opinion is the controlling factor in a democracy.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield. I would not oppose the gentleman's amendment if I were a member of the Tennessee Legislature, and if a bill along the lines he desired was pending before that body.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I do not see how the gentleman can vote against my amendment after the eloquent appeal he has made in behalf of States' rights.

Mr. McCORMACK. As a Member of Congress, I say it is wrong for Congress to put into this law a basic requirement simply to meet a situation which exists in Tennessee. That is a question for the State of Tennessee to solve through its legislature. The Legislature of Tennessee should meet the problem instead of passing the buck to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee now under consideration. I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee because I know that the time is about to be limited for further amendments to title I of the bill. My amendment addresses itself to the same evil that the amendment under consideration attempts to meet.

The amendment I have prepared is as follows:

Page 2, line 20, after semicolon, strike out the word "and", and on line 24, after the word "assistance", strike out the period and quotation marks and insert a semicolon and the following:

and (9) provide that the State, after January 1, 1940, for assistance furnished him under the plan, shall not require security, pledge, or encumbrance by mortgage, trust deed, or deposit of recipient's personal or real property for the repayment of any amounts for old-age assistance.

Briefly, the effect of my amendment would change the claim of the State and the Federal Government from a secured lien mortgage, or pledge upon the property of the old-age pensioner to a general claim against his estate.

The gentleman from Massachusetts has just said that the amendment attempts to direct the way the State shall legislate. In answer to his argument I believe the Federal Government owes a definite responsibility to all of the States because the Federal Government gave birth to this legislation, and in paragraph 7 of the original act I quote:

That if the State or any of its political subdivisions collects from the estate of a recipient of old-age assistance any amount with respect to the old-age assistance furnished him under the plan, one-half of the net amount so collected shall be promptly paid to the United States."

We have given birth to the thought, and we have accepted from the respective States one-half of the moneys collected from the estates of old-age recipients.

Let us examine the figures for the State of Ohio. Since February 11, 1936, $36,648,000 has been paid by the Federal Government to the State of Ohio. During the same term the State of Ohio has paid to the Federal Government the sum of $135,629 as the Federal Government's share of moneys realized from the estates of old-age recipients. One hundred thirty-five thousand six hundred and twenty-nine dollars is one-half of the net amount collected from the estates of old-age pensioners out of the proceeds of their life-insurance policies, bank deposits, and homesteads. The State has realized a net of an equal $135,629. The Federal $135,629 and the State $135,629 gives us a total net sum of $271,258. This is the net amount after court costs, receivers' fees, trustees' fees, and attorneys' fees have been deducted from the gross proceeds of the sale price of oldage pensioners' estates.

I am sure if we knew the total gross sale price of the properties of the old-age pensioners, there would not be one vote cast against this amendment. I am sure if we knew the total gross proceeds of old-age pensioners' estates before attorneys' fees, court costs, receivers' fees, and trustees' fees are deducted to give us the net amount collected, we would never let another day pass until we had enacted this amendment.

One hundred and thirty-five thousand six hundred and twenty-nine dollars recovered in comparison to $36,648,000 paid to my State in old-age pensions in itself shows that the law is of no real benefit to the Government.

The States and the Federal Government can save these attorneys' fees, court costs, receivers' fees, and trustees' fees by passing this amendment and leaving the matter up to the States to legislate on the subject whether they will make the claim for old-age assistance a general claim against the estates of old-age recipients, or completely forbear any recovery for amounts advanced.

So long as the Federal Government encourages the States to put a lien upon the property of old-age recipients by accepting one-half of the net collected from their estates, just that long will old-age pensioners be compelled to give a blanket mortgage, a trust deed, or pledge of every bit of property that they own before they can get their pension. Many of these people have worked all of their lives to complete a contract of purchase of a homestead, or to pay out a small life-insurance policy, only to find when they reach the age of 65 without funds through no fault of their own perhaps, that the arm of their State says, "Before we will give you a pension you must give a mortgage on your property, deliver your insurance policy to secure the State and the Federal Government." Were the mortgage only for $30 or $20 or $10, whatever the pension is for 1 month, and the average in my State is $22 a month, giving a mortgage or delivering an insurance policy would not be so serious, but when an old-age pensioner gives a trust deed or delivers an insurance policy, he parts with a possession for future installments so long as he lives.

You can say to me that the State does not touch the old-age pensioner's property until he is dead, but the effect is just the same as if it were sold at the moment the mortgage was given, or the possession of the policy was parted with. From a practical standpoint a cloud is on the title to the homestead, indefinite in amount because the grocer, the doctor, the hospital, the druggist does not know any more than you and I how long the old-age pensioner will live, and from the moment that the trust deed is delivered and the policy surrendered the old-age pensioner's credit is seriously harmed or completely gone.

No wonder there is dissatisfaction among the old people when they are compelled to part with their dearest possessions in order to receive a sum of money each month that will not keep and maintain them. When sickness strikes, when ill-health raps at the door, when a severe winter comes, when the roof leaks overhead, when clothing and shoes wear out, when teeth need fixing, and eyes fail, it is then that a clear title to a little home, possession of a small insurance policy would give more mental health to our dear friends on the pension rolls, who deserve your consideration and mine, than any empty promises in the future.

Do you want to enact a law that will make it possible for old-age pensioners to maintain their self-respect and selfreliance by handling their own property in their last days? They deserve a better answer from this Government who fathered this alleged humanitarian legislation, than the direction to go to the county pension director.

Somebody has suggested that this would give children an opportunity to avoid their obligation to the parents and later reap the benefit. That observation is made without consideration to this amendment, or the amendment that I have drafted, because the general creditor of an estate stands between the unfaithful son and daughter and his or her inheritance.

I urge that all of you support the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee to give mental hope and a small portion of the more abundant life which this humanitarian law was recommended to be when passed. Remove the cloud on the title of the pensioners' properties, turn from the doors of these old-age pensioners those who would collect trustees' fees, attorneys' fees, court costs, and receivers' fees, because this group of people are the least able to pay them. Let the States collect, if they will, as general creditors for amounts advanced under this law.

Let us put the defenseless widow and her claim for widow's allowance and year's support and other exemptions ahead of the trustee, the receiver, and the foreclosure suit.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments to this title do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Schafer of Wisconsin) there were—ayes 102, noes 35.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Taylor of Tennessee) there were—ayes 42, noes 91.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Maas: On page 3, line 9, after the word "to", strike out "one-half" and insert "two-thirds for each one-third paid by any State, not to exceed $30, to be paid by the Federal Government"; line 13, after the word "institution", insert a period and strike out the comma and the words "not count-"; on line 14, strike out all the words; on line 15, strike out the words "individual for any month as exceeds $40, and" and add "Provided, however, That the total payment to any couple shall not exceed $75 in any one month."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include a table of payments in the various States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's request for inclusion of the table referred to will have to be secured in the House. Without objection, the gentleman's request to extend his own remarks in the Record at this point will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that the Federal Government shall match State funds for oldage assistance on the basis of two dollars for one, up to a total of $30 for the Federal Government contribution. This would make possible a payment of $45 a month as the maximum, as against the present $30 or the $40 proposed in the committee bill. The committee proposal is really useless, because $15 is the practical limit that States can afford to contribute. Only about seven or eight States are now paying even the full $15. The average for both State and Federal contributions is about $19. In Minnesota, where $15 can be paid, very few get the full amount. The average total there is about $20 per month.

This is not security for old age, nor will it induce the older employed people to retire and make way for younger people to get their jobs.

Yet only seven States and Alaska could take advantage of the $20 proposal, because the rest of the States cannot contribute over $15, and therefore the increase could not be matched. In reality the committee bill's so-called increase is no increase at all, since practically no States can obtain it; certainly not until their legislatures meet again and increase the various States' limits.

My amendment will make it possible to increase the old-age assistance in every State without any change in State laws anywhere.

The 2-for-1 proposal will make possible a practical and reasonable old-age payment which would provide security and would permit older employed people to give up their jobs. This would create a considerable relief in the unemployment situation for younger workers.

Incomes are on a national basis today. They are no longer local. The local communities are drained financially into a few large centers. Therefore the Federal Government should and must contribute on the basis of 2 to 1.

It is possible to live upon $45 per month, where it is not upon $30. A couple could draw up to $90, where the State took full advantage of the maximum.

We must either have a reasonable old-age assistance system or none.

We have voted large increases for the Army and Navy. They are essential for national defense. Congress voted hundreds of millions for farm parity. We must also vote adequate pensions to the older people.

This does not mean fantastic schemes, but my proposal is a sound, liberal, workable plan.

I am attaching hereto a list showing payments made in each State under the present social-security system and payments which automatically would be made under my plan:

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hook: On page 3, in line 9, after the comma, insert "equal to $15 per month to each individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not inmate of a public institution, and in addition thereto an amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PITTENGER: On page 3, line 12, strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert in lieu thereof "sixty."
On line 13, after the word "institution", strike out the comma and the words "not counting" and insert in lieu thereof a period and the words "Any married person having title under this section and the wife not having title the rate shall be increased 50 percent more than that of a virgle person, with an additional 10 percent of the than that of a single person, with an additional 10 percent of the base pension for each minor child not self-supporting."

On line 14, strike out all the language, and on line 15 strike out the following language: "individual for any amount as exceeds

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER]. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have offered in connection with the pending bill, H. R. 6635, ought to be adopted because the amendment will strengthen the bill and make it more fair to people entitled to old-age assistance. The amendment makes people at the age of 60 years entitled to the benefits of the act. The present law requires a person to attain the age of 65 before becoming eligible for old-age assistance. I think the age limit should be lowered.

Then the amendment further provides that a married man, whose wife is not entitled to the benefits of the act, shall receive 50 percent more than a single person, and in addition 10 percent of his base pension for every minor child not selfsupporting. It ought to require no argument to convince you that a married man should receive more than a single person. and this amendment would provide for that result.

Several other worth-while amendments have been offered today. I refer, for example, to the amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor], which would forbid the States from putting liens upon the homesteads of aged persons who apply for assistance. That amendment should have been adopted. Likewise, other amendments should have had favorable consideration. Evidently those in control of this pending legislation do not want any amendments. I think that is a mistaken viewpoint.

I want to say to the Members of the House that the present social-security law is wholly inadequate, and in my opinion it is not working out satisfactorily. I believe that old-age assistance should be national and uniform in its scope. The present act is neither. The debate on the floor of the House today indicates clearly that in some States proper legislation is enacted so that the State set-up makes certain grants and these, of course, are matched by Federal contributions. On the other hand, some States fail to set up the necessary machinery or to make proper appropriations of money so as to get Federal aid.

I want to be fair, and I will admit that the present bill does liberalize the existing law. But it does not go far enough. It leaves too much discretion to the various States. If the States do not take advantage of the Federal law. then the aged people who need assistance will have to suffer

The people who framed the original social-security law were well intentioned, but I do not believe that they realized that this was a national problem, and not one for solution by the States. I do not think old-age pensions should be based on State lines. Neither do I think that the States should be made the basis for determining the revenue or the disbursements to be made to those entitled to a pension.

I speak from observation when I say that in my district the payments are inadequate, and that there is real distress in spite of the small help that comes from the revenue provided by the present law.

I hope that the Ways and Means Committee will look with favor upon the amendment that I have proposed, as well as upon other worth-while amendments that have for their purpose the liberalization of the present bill to the end that the aged people of the United States may be given adequate assistance.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THIL: Page 3, line 15, after "exceeds", strike out "$40" and insert "$60."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THILL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Schafer of Wisconsin) there were-ayes 13, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. THILL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THILL. Mr. Chairman, debates and arguments have continued for some time on this section of the bill. My amendment simply provides for increasing the total amount of old-age assistance benefits from $30 to $60 per month. Some say that this amendment is innocuous; others contend that the adoption of my amendment will be an inducement to the States to take advantage of the greater financial aid to be provided by the Federal Government.

Many needy aged cannot possibly live decently on $30 a month. It is altogether proper and fitting that we take care of our old people and keep them in some semblance of comfort, providing them with needed food, clothing, and shelter.

It has been estimated that an increase in old-age assistance grants from $30 to $40 per month will cost between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000. Increasing the grants from $30 to $60 per month will, according to the estimates, cost less than $30,000,000. How can anyone interested in the plight of our old people have any objection to this amendment?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hook: On page 2, in line 8, after the semicolon, strike out all down to and including the semicolon in line 12 and insert "(5) Provide such methods of administra-tion as are found by the Board to be necessary for the efficient operation of the plan: Provided, however, That the selection, tenure of office, and compensation of personnel shall be approved

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Hook].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Geyer of California: On page 3, line 12, strike out the words "sixty-five" and all the remainder of the paragraph, down to and including line 18 on the same page, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "60 years of age or older and is not an inmate of a public institution, not counting so much of such expenditure with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $60, except that such amount shall equal at least $15 for each month during such quarter with respect to each such indi-vidual receiving not less than $22.50 during such month, and (2) 5 percent of such amount, which shall be used for paying the costs of administering the State plan or for old-age assistance, or both, and for no other purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I have but 5 minutes. These amendments would lower the age of the recipient from 65 to 60. Surely those of 60 who have been thrown on the scrap heap are entitled to care as a matter of right. I wish I had time to develop this point.

The plan I propose also allows the Federal Government to match the State below $7.50, but, above that, up to $15 contribution by the State, the Federal Government will contribute $15. This would allow the poor State, on paying $7.50, to get a pension of $22.50. Surely this is not too much.

This amendment also allows the State to contribute, if it cares to, $30, which the Federal Government will match, allowing the recipient to receive "60 at 60." Above that amount of $60 per month the State alone must pay the excess.

I am proud to offer this amendment. I am anxious to care for our senior citizens.

Some will say, "Where are we going to get the money?" To this I answer: The same place we get the money for battleships with which to destroy lives we will get the money to save precious lives. It will cost about the same amount as one of these giant instruments of death. This bill that we are considering allows my State but $5 more per month and keeps the age at 65 without my amendment. Of course, I will vote for this pittance, but I hope my amendment will pass, making our old-age feature of the Social Security Act really much better rather than a mockery.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Hobbs: Page 3, line 15, after "(2)", Amendment offered by Mr. Hobbs: Page 3, line 15, after "(2)", insert "to each such State in which the total old-age assistance paid each recipient for any quarter heretofore did not exceed $30, a second or additional amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, equal to one-half of such total of the sums expended during such quarter as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each needy individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not an inmate of a public institution; and (3)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobbs].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Hobbs]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will, if adopted, be of benefit to eight States only. Those prospective beneficiaries are North Carolina, Virginia, Kentucky, Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Arkansas.

The reason upon which this proposal is based was set forth as best I could in the limited time allowed me in the general debate last Tuesday. It is, simply, the story of the widow's mite. They have each done their best, and, out of their meager revenues, have appropriated every cent they could, but still their needy aged eligibles have received as a monthly pension less than $10.

The President, the Social Security Board, and the Ways and Means Committee have repeatedly said that the minimum pension should be $15 a month.

Try to live on $15 a month and see if you think that too

Yet not one of these States has been able to reach even $10. These States have strained themselves and exhausted every means at their command. The Social Security Board knows that this is true. Is it too much to ask of Uncle Sam, who created the hope and urged its reasonableness, that he help to satisfy that hope? His nieces and nephews live in these eight States as well as in the richer Commonwealths.

Two dollars of Federal money for every one of the first $5 paid by any one of these eight States will assure a pension of $15 a month, approximately.

This House has said by its vote on other amendments today that we should not do much more. Should we do nothing?

May I not plead with you to rise at least to this level of unselfishness and give the aged poor in these eight States these crumbs which should be allowed to fall from the Nation's table?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Fish: On page 3, strike out lines 3 to 18 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"PAYMENT TO STATES

"SEC. 3. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for old-age assistance, for each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing January 1, 1940, (1) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as old-age assistance, equal to the sum of the following proportions of the amounts expended during such quarter assistance under the State Plan with present taken as old-age assistance under the State plan with respect to each needy individual who at the time of such expenditure is 65 years of age or older and is not an inmate of a public institution:

"(A) Five-eights of such expenditures, not counting so much thereof with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds

On page 4, line 6, strike out "one-half" and insert in lieu thereof "the State's proportionate share." The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Fish) there were-ayes 21, noes 87.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOUGHTON (interrupting the reading of title II). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this title be dispensed with.

Mr. TREADWAY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, this will not preclude anyone from offering an amendment to this title?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAVENNER: Page 36, line 13, strike out beginning with the comma after the word "home" down through the word "sorority" in line 15.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, this is one of a series of amendments to the pending bill which have been proposed by the American Federation of Labor in the belief that the coverage of old-age benefits and unemployment compensation should be extended rather than limited, as is the case in certain sections of the bill now before us.

The American Federation of Labor, in common with all other advocates of adequate social security in America, is convinced that certain provisions of this bill, which at first glance might appear relatively unimportant, as a matter of fact constitute a grave threat to the preservation of our newly established American system of social security.

We are apprehensive, in other words, that the exclusion of certain workers provided for by this bill is the first thrust of the camel's nose under the tent of social-security coverage which may eventually topple over that vitally important social structure.

In this belief we have the unqualified support of the Advisory Council on Social Security, a body of experts representing labor, employers, and the public, appointed by the United States Senate to study the advisability of amending the Social Security Act. In its report to the Senate, of December last, the Advisory Council urged in the strongest terms that the coverage of social-security benefits be extended and not diminished, and emphasized the fact that the Social Security Act was written primarily for the protection of the workers of America.

One of the effects of the definitions in sections 209, 1426, and 1607 is to exclude from coverage domestic workers employed in a local college club, or a local chapter of a fraternity or sorority. The amendment which I have submitted strikes out these exemptions, but leaves domestic service in a private home still exempt.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAVENNER. I would prefer to complete my statement before yielding.

Mr. BUCK. I would like to know just how far the gentleman's amendment goes. I did not hear it read; I am very sorry.

Mr. HAVENNER. It merely strikes out everything in that exemption following the word "home."

Mr. BUCK. Is that subdivision (2)?

Mr. HAVENNER. It is on page 36, line 13. I am not sure about the number of the subdivision.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman. I wanted to find out what the gentleman is offering.

Mr. HAVENNER. I have been a member of a college fraternity for 35 years and am very much devoted to its ideals and associations, but I can think of no good reason why a domestic worker who earns his living as a cook, waiter, or house boy in a fraternity house should be deprived of the social-security credits to which he would be entitled if he were employed in a similar capacity in a hotel or public boarding house.

The persons who work for college clubs, fraternal and benefit associations, and students who work for schools or colleges while they are in attendance at such institutions should, even though their earnings are small and the employing unit not a profit-making organization, be entitled to the security of old age and unemployment insurance provided they meet the general eligibility tests established in respect to their total earnings or period of work and length of time employed. Each year of a person's working life should help contribute to the security of his old age. Coverage of the act when changed should be toward a larger inclusion. No backward steps should be taken which reduce the number of persons entitled to security.

The purpose of this amendment is to keep under the provisions of the Social Security Act workers who are now covered and who would be excluded under the provisions of this bill. Workers who have already contributed from their salaries for old-age insurance would hereafter be excluded under those provisions and would lose the security they had begun to build up.

If this amendment is adopted, as in justice to a large number of employees throughout the country I believe it should be, I shall offer a similar amendment to section 1426 and section 1607 so that the same exemptions may be stricken out of those sections.

I urge all those who are interested in preserving the integrity of our new social-security program for the benefit of our American workers to support this amendment. Its defeat would mean an initial encroachment upon the scope of social-security coverage in America, which we have fought so hard to establish. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

If I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, on page 36, he is referring to employment in a local college club or a local chapter of a college fraternity or sorority. He wants that item stricken out of the bill.

We had extensive hearings, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of employment of college students. It was the unanimous view at the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means and of the committee itself that fraternity employment should be excluded from coverage under the Social Security Act. Under existing law there is a distinction between the employment of college students by the college, which was exempt, and employment by a fraternity, which was included. The idea of the committee was simply to put them on an equal basis. I believe it would be very detrimental to the well-being of college students and college fraternities if this subdivision were stricken out.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. One of the main and compelling reasons was that most of these boys are working to get an education. If they cannot get work in these fraternity houses they will be unable to get an education. The work is purely incidental to the primary purpose of obtaining an education.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. This is simply another method of support. The boys work not for the actual dollars and cents payment in cash but for their board or room.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I am sure the gentleman will also recall that the boys who are working their way through school by working for a dormitory operated by the school are exempt, but if they work for a fraternity they are not exempt. The purpose of this provision is to try to equalize the situation and make it fair to all the boys attending school.

Mr. TREADWAY. The purpose of the committee is to show no discrimination between students, whether they are working for the college or for a fraternity. The exemption of educational institutions takes care of the boys if they are working for the college, but not if they are working for a club or fraternity.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from California will be voted down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, here is a piece of legislation with good in it and bad in it.

The relief which it gives to employees and employers in reducing their pay-roll taxes for the years 1940, 1941, and 1942 is most commendable. Likewise, the repeal of the provision for a large reserve fund, with the savings it makes and the additional benefits it permits, together with the limitation of pay-roll taxes on incomes not exceeding $3,000.

Nor shall I quarrel with the objectives sought in this bill under titles I and V. I do contend, however, that this is bad legislation, because there is no provision for raising the money to pay for these extra costs. No one in this House can honestly take exception to this view. I am certain the folks back home feel the same way about it.

Even the beneficiaries of this legislation would not expect us to provide an increase in their pension allowances without providing the taxes to pay for them.

This legislation is bad in other respects. No one in this House knows, or has any way of knowing, what the additional costs are going to be under title I, whether they will be $5,000,000, $100,000,000, or several hundred million. If no changes in State laws are made, we are told the extra cost will be only $5,000,000. The principal argument for the amendment to this title is that it increases the amount by that sum only.

Now, if no change is made in the Ohio law, our aged will receive no benefits from this legislation, while at the same time our State will be taxed to pay pension benefits to States that can take advantage of it. That obviously would be an injustice.

It is to be expected, of course, that some States will change their laws. This is, in my opinion, shortsighted and slipshod legislation, in that it does not contemplate this contingency.

Even if the additional cost were to be only $5,000,000, this legislation is defective in not providing taxes to meet this sum. But when the cost may conceivably run up to $100,000,000 or more, then its defectiveness becomes so clear that it should not be overlooked.

I cannot see any enduring social security in legislation of this sort. I can see in it only social insecurity if not economic chaos. It is one thing to provide public pensions for the aged on a pay-as-you-go basis but it is quite another to borrow money and add to an already dangerously excessive national debt to pay for them. In the end all social security must depend upon the economic health of our Nation, for which a highly solvent Government is one of the first essentials. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAVENNER: On page 38, strike out lines 4 to 26, inclusive, and on page 39, strike out lines 1 to 22, inclusive

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, increasing the number of exclusions from the provisions of the Social Security Act is directly contrary to the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Social Security, the committee of experts appointed by the United States Senate to which I referred in my previous remarks. This committee, incidentally, included as far as labor is concerned representatives of both the American Federation of Labor and the C. I. O.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported without taking it out of the gentleman's time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the Havenner amendment.

Mr. HAVENNER. The Advisory Council specifically recommended that employees of private nonprofit religious, charitable, and educational institutions should be brought under coverage immediately. The report of the Advisory Council contained an emphatic declaration that all changes in coverage should be in the direction of including more workers and that effort should be made toward that goal in the near future. I am authorized to say that the American Federation of Labor concurs in that recommendation.

In the amendment now before you, which has been prepared by the American Federation of Labor, the exemptions in section 209, subsection 10, would be stricken out. These include the following classes of service performed in the employ of any organization exempt from income tax under section 101 of the Internal Revenue Code:

Cases where the remuneration for service does not exceed $45 in any calendar quarter.

When the service is in connection with the collection of dues or premiums for a fraternal beneficiary society and is performed away from the home office, or is ritualistic service in connection with any such society.

When the service is performed by a student enrolled and regularly attending classes at a school, college, or university.

When the service is performed in the employ of an agricultural or horticultural organization.

When the service is performed in the employ of a voluntary employees beneficiary association.

When the service is performed in the employ of a school, college, or university not exempt from income tax when the student is enrolled and regularly attending classes and the remuneration does not exceed $45.

I quote to you now the recommendation of the Advisory Council on Social Security with respect to the exemptions which would be stricken out with this amendment:

The employees of private nonprofit religious, charitable, educational institutions now excluded from coverage under titles II and VIII should immediately be brought into coverage under the same provisions of these titles as affect other covered groups.

The council believes that there is no justification in social policy for the exclusion of the employees of such organizations from the protection afforded by the insurance program here recommended. Further, no special administrative difficulties exist in the coverage of the employees of such organizations under the

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Havenner: On page 40, line 15, strike out lines 15 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, one of the principal arguments against retaining student nurses within the coverage of this bill is that their earnings are so small that it is a nuisance to collect the tax and imposes an unjustifiable amount of work in compiling the records upon the Federal and State agencies and the employers. This argument entirely overlooks the fact that the law was written for the benefit of the workers and not primarily for the convenience of their employers. These young girls who work as student nurses are fully entitled to some credit in their youth for the long and arduous labor which they perform. and to deny them the right to build up a wage record during their service as students is an absolute injustice.

In my State of California this same argument was advanced and became the motif of a long, bitter fight in the State legislature years ago when the 8-hour law for women was under consideration. There humane considerations prevailed, and when the law was finally passed student nurses were given the protection of the 8-hour law limitation. The American Federation of Labor stands squarely behind this amendment, and I earnestly hope that Congress will give to these girl workers the recognition which they deserve.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAVENNER: On page 45, strike out lines 3 to 25, inclusive, and on page 46, strike out lines 1 to 6, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(L) The term 'agricultural labor' means only the services of a farmhand employed by a farmer to do the ordinary work connected with a bona fide farm. It does not include services proceed on farmer whose scale or nature of operations makes them. formed on farms whose scale or nature of operations makes them industrial in character. In no case does it include more than the first processing of products which is incidental to the farming operations.

Mr. HAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, the definition of the term "agricultural labor" proposed by H. R. 6635, is broader than that which has been used by the Bureau of Internal Revenue in determining coverage. Therefore workers who have already contributed to the old-age pension fund would not be protected in the future and many would be barred. The purpose of the exclusion of agricultural labor when the Social Security Act was passed was to avoid a difficult administrative problem of including hired hands on many small and separated farms. The difficulty was believed to be similar to that of covering domestic workers in private homes. However, the Advisory Council on Social Security and the Social Security Board have urged that coverage be extended to farm laborers as soon as administratively feasible. The whole purpose of social-security laws is to increase the security of workers of our Nation. Coverage should be made broader as administrative techniques function more smoothly. At no time should coverage be narrowed with the result that classes of people once included are later excluded.

Both the Advisory Council on Social Security and the American Federation of Labor believe that reduction in coverage is contrary to the public interest and that agricultural labor should continue to be defined narrowly until such date as all agricultural laborers are covered. To include as agricultural labor persons engaged in handling, drying, packing, packaging, processing, freezing, grading, storing, or delivering to storage or market any agricultural and horticultural commodities, not even confining such operations to the first processing will remove security from many workers now covered. Large farms which carry on many such processes are really industrial in character and their employees should not suffer this discrimination.

I appreciate the efforts of the representatives of the agricultural districts to protect the small farmer from undue taxation, and in common with many other representatives of the urban population I have repeatedly voted to extend Federal aid to the farming communities. However, we who live in the cities cannot find any social or economic justification for exempting the farmer from taxation for skilled industrial work performed on his farm by carpenters, painters, and so forth, when we city dwellers would be liable for taxation of work of an identical character if it were performed in our own home.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I would not do so, and I do not desire to take up the time of the Committee unduly, but I feel it necessary to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that yesterday, in the remarks to be found on page 6864 of the RECORD, I discussed this proposed amendment somewhat extensively and showed why the committee unanimously had agreed upon the language submitted in the bill which the gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER] would strike out. All I desire to do is to add this statement. After the question came before the committee and when the committee had unanimously decided to continue the exclusion of agricultural labor, employees of religious and charitable institutions, and so forth, and the question was directly put to Dr. Altmeyer, he said, at page 2329 of the hearings:

I want to make it clear that the Board does not take issue with this committee on its decision on a matter of policy * * *. As a matter of public policy we agree with the committee it is unwise to legislate in advance of further study of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Kean: Page 8, line 10, after the word "acquired", strike out all following down through line 4, page 9, and substitute the following: "Only by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price and may be acquired only on such terms as to provide an investment yield of not less than the average rate of interest, computed as of the end of the calendar month next preceding the acquisition, borne by all interest-bearing obligations of the United States then forming a part of the public debt, except that where such average rate is not a multiple of one-eighth of 1 percent, the rate of obligations purchased may be a multiple of one-eighth of 1 percent next lower than such average rate. If no such obligations can be purchased at such an investment yield, obligations of a less yield which have been outstanding for at least 1 year may be purchased and thereupon shall be exchanged for 1 year may be purchased and thereupon shall be exchanged for original issues at par of special obligations having an investment yield not less than the yield which would be required if obligations of the required yield were purchased in the open market. The purpose for which obligations of the United States may be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, are hereby extended to authorize the issuance at par of special obligations

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would compel the board of trustees created by this act to set up a real trust fund. There is no need of discussing the merits of the question now, as it has been fully discussed not only in the debates on the floor on the bill but also before the country during the last election campaign.

The amendment provides that investments can be made only in United States Government bonds which have been outstanding for at least 1 year, and that if the return on these bonds is too low, for the purposes of the fund, they may be exchanged at the Treasury for securities with a yield of not less than the average rate of interest borne by all interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

In my opinion only by the adoption of such an amendment can we prevent the present practice of using old-age taxes for current expenses.

The fact that such an amendment is needed seems to have been recognized by the committee in the proposed changes to this section; but to my mind these changes do not sufficiently restrict the authority of the trustees—as they allow the purchase of either original issues at par or special Treasury obligations, the purchase of either of which would result in the use of the funds for current expenses.

The amendment offered, permitting only the purchase of securities already outstanding, would make this impossible and provide a real trust fund.

Let us keep faith with the contributors to this fund.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The provisions by which the investment of the money under the old-age reserve account at the present time held by the trustees and the future investment of funds to be of the proposed trust fund are quite similar. The procedure is standard and has been used for many years. It was adopted originally by Secretary Mellon in connection with the civil-service retirement fund and the adjustedservice certificate fund. I call attention to what Secretary Mellon said would follow the adoption of the policy suggested by the gentleman who last spoke. I quote from what Secretary Mellon said (annual report to Congress, 1926):

If the Treasury were in the Government bond market on the 1st of January in each year to buy $100,000,000 of its securities, the purchases could not be made in 1 day, nor could such a large order be filled without unduly increasing the market price which the fund would have to pay. If, also, the Treasury in the course of the year was required to sell securities to provide the fund with cash, the tendency would then be to depress Government securities on the market. So if the practice of buying and selling on the open market were used, the Treasury would be continually purchasing on a high market.

Mr. Chairman, the adoption of this amendment would entirely defeat the purpose of conserving and preserving the assets of the trust fund for its future beneficiaries. I ask that the amendment be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. As gentlemen are well aware, this is the first time that I have addressed the House this year. It is to be presumed that the king is always right; when in a courthouse it is to be presumed that the court is always right. Likewise when the committee has a bill, and when the committee opposes amendments to that bill, it is the usual custom to presume that the committee is always right. But not always. One amendment here this afternoon was defeated that ought to have been adopted, and somewhere in this bill before we finish, at some proper place and time, it will come up again in a different form though practically it will be the same thing. I have reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Taylor]. A number of States which at first thought that old-age pensions were a bonanza and everybody was going to live forever and did not need any property, and those States passed laws immediately compeling the conveyance of homesteads to the State. We have such a law in Kentucky. The amendment that was defeated undertook to take care of that situation. The amendment will be offered somewhere, somehow, and will provide that the property shall be used and occupied as a homestead only.

Let me illustrate. Here is a man who is 65 years of age, who is drawing an old-age pension. He leaves a widow who is 49 years old. He deeds the property to the State, and after he is dead, and has been hauled away, where is the widow going to stay and what is she going to do? She is the widow of a pauper. What is she going to do? That home may have been worth $2,500 or $75, it may be just a half acre place, a place to raise chickens, a place to sleep in, a place in which to keep warm. What is that property worth to the State, where the party is going to be highly eligible for an old-age pension. What is it worth? Then again, that party needs something to bury him, and burial expenses in most States come in as preferred claims to the property before it can be passed out to the heirs.

My good friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCormack) talked loud and long, and vociferously about the Federal Government legislating and telling the States what they could do and what they could not do. We have many laws, hundreds of them, where we have appropriated money, where we have attached conditions down to a gnat's capacity, of what to do and how to do it.

They will make you tear up a Federal road for a mile because it has something in it that does not belong to it, and do it all over again. On your educational grants the Smith-Hughes Act and others, all of your New Deal acts, where the town has to furnish the house, or a certain part of the machinery—what is it that we have done, I ask you? It will reach 95 percent of all the money the Federal Government appropriates where you tell the States you have to do it this way in order to get the money. By telling the States, "In order to administer this old-age pension matter you cannot do it this way or that way," is perfectly fair. It is an oversight in taking over the homestead and it ought to be restored. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include some figures on social security.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Carlson: On page 36, line 4, strike out the words "irrespective of the citizenship."

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to some new language that is going into the Social Security Act; that is, if this amendment is adopted. The committee wrote into this bill that this act shall apply irrespective of the citizenship. That is not in the original act. Someone will ask why is it placed in this bill at the time when we are considering largely our American citizens? In other words, this bill is now open to aliens. Now, that is true of the present act, but this particular amendment is put in here for a specific reason, and that is to care for a new group.

I want to call your attention to page 41. We are going to analyze this and see what this amendment does. I do not believe the committee wants to do it after we get into it, and I do not believe the Congress should do this.

On page 41, line 13—I wish you would follow me, because when this is done you will hear some criticism. It deals with the inclusion of seamen, but it does not say "American seamen." It says "the term American vessel may mean any vessel documented or numbered under the laws of the United States"—

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman go back, if he does not mind, and read, on page 36, the covering service on or in connection with an American vessel?

Mr. CARLSON. I will be glad to leave that to the gentleman from California. I would like to discuss the effect of this amendment to this section. I intend to discuss the other one later, because I intend to offer an amendment to strike it also.

A vessel does not need to be documented under the flag of the United States or any country. It can belong to a group of foreign citizens. It can be manned by a foreign crew, not an American sailor on it; and if we leave these words in that bill, we put them under this act, under the old-age insurance. I do not believe this House wants to do that.

Here is a concrete case of why this was written in:

We hire Greek ships, owned and manner by Greek citizens, for sponge fisheries off the coast of Florida.

I do not believe it is the intention of this Congress to cover Greek sailors who man that boat.

Now, we have heard a lot about the Japanese vessels fishing for salmon in the Northwest. Notice what this particular section says:

If its crew is employed solely by one or more citizens or residents of the United States or corporations.

Now, the crew on this boat need not be Americans. The boat need not be documented under any flag. The crew can be absolutely foreign. These Japanese fishing boats that fish for salmon can be hired by a corporation or an individual citizen of the United States, and we American citizens are going to put them under this act and give them old-age insurance.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLSON. I yield.

LXXXIV—438

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It would be entirely possible, would it not, for a Japanese boat, complemented with Japanese people, from the captain on down—

Mr. CARLSON. There need not be an American seaman on any of these boats. I, for one, am not going to let this amendment go through this House without giving you an opportunity to vote on removing it from this bill. The only reason these particular words were put in this bill was to care for this section and another section, and those words "irrespective of the citizenship" are not in this act.

I hope you will vote to take them out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, at the present time seamen are not covered under the Social Security Act. It is proposed to put them under coverage as far as old-age insurance is concerned. Every employee in covered employment in the United States, whether he is a citizen or an alien, working, let us say for the Ford Motor Co. or any other manufacturing industry, is covered. He is also covered even though his employer be an alien.

What we want to do is to have the seamen covered on the same basis. On yesterday I put into the Record the actual figures which show that American maritime employment is 90.1 percent performed by American citizens at the present time. Most of the remainder of those employed on American vessels have already taken out their first papers, and it seems to me it is begging the question to say that a man working on land for the Ford Motor Co., for instance, may be an alien and receive all the protection of the Social Security Act but a similar man working in maritime employment may not.

There is no opposition from either employers or employees to the inclusion of seamen under this act.

The inclusion of the phrase "irrespective of citizenship" to which the gentleman from Kansas has objected is necessary in the case of seamen, for the reason that most of the services performed on maritime vessels with respect to which the social-security taxes will apply will be performed outside of the United States. The courts might consider the levying of such taxes to be beyond the normal, usual exercise of the taxing power and give the statute otherwise a narrower construction unless we express the intent specifically. In this connection I call attention to a quotation I put in the RECORD yesterday from the case of the United States v. Goelet (232 U. S. 293). In that case the Court held that the tax levied by the Federal Government did not apply to a citizen having a permanent residence and domicile abroad. The tax was an excise tax on yachts; the yacht was a foreign-built yacht.

In view of the statements that were contained in that decision of the Supreme Court, it seemed wise to us to include the phrase that we put in here in the definition of employment for purposes of old-age insurance provisions of the law since it is our intent to levy the taxes on services performed outside the United States on American vessels.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I assume that the gentleman from California heard the statement of the gentleman from Kansas with reference to a Greek vessel or a Jap vessel that might be fishing off or near our American coasts, but actually operated by foreigners. Some of us have been waiting for the gentleman, who is a distinguished member of the committee, to answer that particular argument raised by the gentleman from Kansas. I am certain none of us wish to vote for anything that will permit such a condition. Will the gentleman elaborate on that at this time?

Mr. BUCK. The coverage, of course, as the gentleman from Oklahoma knows, provides only that the crew is covered if it is employed solely by one or more citizens of the United States or residents of the United States, or corporations organized under the laws of the United States or of any State. As far as that is concerned, I think the laws of every State require that at least a majority of the stock of a corporation must be held by citizens of the United

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. BUCK. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I want to ask the gentleman a question. If I understood the gentleman's argument correctly, it was that in the case of an alien working for Henry Ford the alien was entitled to the benefit of our socialsecurity laws—and he ought to be.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman does not deny that, does he?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; for I have always maintained that when an alien is working right alongside of others on the same machine or similar machines, on similar lathes, and he ought not to have the same privileges as his fellow workers: but in that case the owner of the property, or the corporation owner, the factory owner is an American.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman let me reply to his statement? If the employer were an alien, the employee would still be protected.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Let us see if he would.

Mr. BUCK. That is apparent.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Even if he were an alien operating in our country, he would be under the supervision of the local police forces, and all that, and he would be in a different category from some of those to which this language under discussion applies. Why would not the gentleman agree to this sort of amendment: Change the language on page 36 where it says "by an employer for the person employing him irrespective of citizenship of either," if we are going to let these sailors, these Japanese, and so on, come under the provisions of our law; why not take out the word "either"?

Mr. BUCK. Just a minute. I cannot yield all my time to the gentleman.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection. Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio to complete his statement.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Instead of leaving the language on page 36, line 4, as it is, "by an employee for the person employing him, irrespective of the citizenship or residence of either," why does not the gentleman make some provision so that these Japanese sailors, Greek sailors, Chinese sailors, or whatever they may be, shall be employed by an American or an American company? Will not the gentleman go that far?

Mr. BUCK. Now, will the gentleman let me explain? If the gentleman will turn to page 41 he will find definitions. In the first place, let me say that the covered employment of a seaman must be in connection with an American vessel.

Then we define an American vessel, on page 41, to mean any vessel, documented or numbered under the laws of the United States, or not documented elsewhere, if its crew is employed solely by one or more citizens or residents of the United States. I think that answers the gentleman's objec-

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That does not cover the provision on page 36 and that is what I want to do. If you can make page 36 cover that then you have a good basis for your

Mr. BUCK. If the gentleman does not want to take as sound the case of United States against Goelet, which I cited as the law, that might be all right, but we are up against a practical proposition. These services are performed outside the United States. The gentleman knows that has all been threshed out in the committee. The gentleman knows very well we had this up and discussed it thoroughly. This is the opinion of the majority, if not the unanimous opinion of the

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Massachu-

Mr. McCORMACK. And the services performed outside the United States are not for persons living in foreign countries. It is men employed by either American citizens or persons who are subject to the laws of the United States, who are within the United States. So that the situation of a Japanese vessel, which, of course, alarms some people, does not apply. It has no application to a vessel coming from Japan and going into the fishing trade. An inference is left with reference to some Greek vessel coming from Greece, but there is no justification for that. One has to be a citizen of the United States, employing others, or one who is a resident of the United States, just the same as any other business activity.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. Is it not true that if we tamper with this we are going to put the American seamen at a disadvantage? The Great Lakes are interested in this. I remember this matter coming up in committee. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas how many sailors and seamen he has in Kansas? I may also say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that he has not any out there either. We are interested in this and we are protecting the American seamen.

Mr. BUCK. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Michigan for their contributions.

Mr. Chairman, I feel the objections that have been raised by the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Kansas, and I know they are both sincere, go to matters that are not fundamental. There is no danger to American labor or capital. If there was anything to worry about so far as Japanese seamen are concerned, I think the gentleman from California who is speaking would be concerned about it.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. For the benefit of the Members of Congress, I just called the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Due to the late hour, for it is now approximately 6 o'clock, unfortunately his office is closed and he is not in. As the next ranking member of that committee may I call the attention of my colleague to the fact that we protected through the medium of the ship subsidy bill recently enacted every man and woman who works upon an American ship and provided that every man and woman who works upon an American ship operating in foreign countries must be a 100 percent American citizen.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as I said awhile ago, I do not want to emasculate this bill. I think this is an oversight and ought to be corrected. On page 41 is where we treat the problem of the seamen. I am not disclosing any secret when I say we had a battle over this. We agreed on the proposition largely upon the argument made by the gentleman, to which I subscribed. I say that when an alien is working across a lathe from an American citizen in an American factory he ought to have exactly the same rights and the same protection as his fellow workers; but when you get into an industry like that employing seamen, the situation is different. The situs of the employment in one case is fixed while in the other it is shifting, taking the employee often into foreign lands and over the Seven Seas. That is the occupation that gives us the most trouble from an immigration and labor standpoint. They go from place to place and have no home. The question of the administration of this law to take care of them will be tremendously different from the administration of a law that takes care of the man who works in Detroit for Mr. Ford or somebody else.

Let us look at page 36. You cannot lose anything if a few words are inserted in there. Let me read the amendment that I think will solve this problem and see if the gentleman will not agree with me. If he does not agree with me, of course, I realize that we might not be able to win our contention, because the policy is to not emasculate this bill and I shall adhere to that. Still it is unwise to be so prideful as not to yield to an amendment that will manifestly improve the bill.

What would the gentleman say if we struck out the words in the third line on page 36, "for the person", and inserted the following: "of an American citizen"? And in line 4, struck out the words "irrespective of citizenship or residence of either", so that the language would be in lines 3 and 4, on page 36?-

December 31, 1939, by an employee of an American citizen or corporation or partnership employing him (A).

I would be perfectly willing to recede from my objection if the gentleman would accept an amendment like that. Let him be an American employer, so we will have a truthful and proper report made to our Social Security Board in Washington, and so that we may have somebody that we can hold responsible. Then let the crew be whatever it may be. Why not put that in?

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. BUCK. The effect of the amendment which the gentleman suggests would be to prohibit any employee now in covered employment, who is working for an alien inside the United States as well as on a ship from receiving any benefits under this act.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not agree with the gentleman. Mr. BUCK. It would. That covers both provisions.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know the sincerity of my friend on the committee. I am fearful, however, if an amendment like that is adopted you are going to give the alien in the United States operating ships an advantage over an American operating ship because the American operator will have to pay the pay-roll tax and the other fellow will not.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. This is the point I am trying to cover, and I will leave it with you again. Here is a man in New York who is an importer. He is an importer of fish or something that comes from the waters of Australia or way cut in midocean in the Pacific. He can employ a Japanese or a Portuguese or anybody else in the world to operate a ship out there, who will have an exclusive Japanese crew, and he can employ them for years and years and maybe never see them or know anything about them except that they are catching fish for his boats which come along periodically and accept their catch, or he may employ nobody but Japs.

Mr. BUCK. Now, wait a minute.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. He might involve us by his farflung activities in all kinds of trouble, war troubles maybe, and fishing boundary troubles, and many other controversies.

Mr. BUCK. He cannot. The gentleman knows very well that under the maritime acts that is impossible. The number of aliens that can be employed is strictly limited, and the number is decreasing all the time; there is no question about

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. CARLSON. That is the point I am trying to make, and this section does not cover that. An American citizen can hire a crew that is 100 percent foreign, I do not care what nationality it may be.

Mr. SIROVICH. He cannot do that according to the law.

Mr. CARLSON. Read the bill.

Mr. SIROVICH. Let me tell the gentleman something. I know a lot more about the law than the gentleman does.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman cannot be right.

Mr. SIROVICH. Let me explain. Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I know what the gentleman has in mind, but the gentleman cannot be right when he says that every man that works on a registered boat is an American citizen, because that is not right.

Mr. BUCK. Is the gentleman referring to me?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No; I meant the gentleman from New York.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Carlson].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Carlson) there were-ayes 24, noes 59.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and four Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Carlson: On page 41, beginning in line 13, strike out lines 13 to 20, inclusive.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to take the time of the Committee so late in the afternoon, but I ask anyone-I ask the gentleman from California or anyone else—to deny the fact that American citizens, individually, collectively, or as a corporation, can hire a foreign-owned ship with a 100 percent foreign crew, with not an American sailor on it, and that these men will come under the old-age insurance provisions of this act?

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. CARLSON. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he would want an American citizen-

Mr. CARLSON. Wait a minute.

Mr. DINGELL. Just let me answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. CARLSON. Then answer it.

Mr. DINGELL. An American citizen has the privilege of hiring a foreign vessel now.

Mr. CARLSON. Surely. I am for it. Let him hire all he

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman wants to bring them into competition with American vessels whose seamen come under the act. If he does that, he will be helping to destroy our merchant marine.

Mr. CARLSON. I am opposed to the United States putting these foreigners under the old-age insurance provisions, and these foreigners are being hired now.

Mr. DINGELL. You cannot stop them from hiring foreign vessels.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted, you will stop it.

Mr. CARLSON. If you adopt this amendment, you will take this section out, and it will be all right. That is what the Congress ought to do.

Mr. DINGELL. You will destroy the American merchant marine if you do that.

Mr. CARLSON. The section in which the gentleman is interested is on page 36. If you will strike this out, I will not move to strike that out. This section ought to come out, and I say that in all seriousness.

I ask the gentleman from California [Mr. Buck] if he will not tell the House if I have not stated the facts on this amendment?

Mr. BUCK. Of course, the gentleman realizes the fact that vessels that are documented or numbered under the laws of any foreign country-

Mr. CARLSON. Or without any country.

Mr. BUCK. Without any country? The number of those is so negligible that it does not amount to anything, in the first place. Second, you have the competitive situation to consider in there. The people who are brought under this act, if they are brought under it, will be paying the payroll tax.

Mr. CARLSON. I just want to say that no one has yet taken the floor and said that I have not stated the facts. As long as we have millions of American citizens who are not under this old-age insurance provision and receiving the protection of this Government, I for one will absolutely not stand on this floor and permit this bill to go through without my vote being cast against it. If this Congress does what I believe it ought to do, it will strike this section out.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman

Mr. CARLSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I think the gentleman will agree with me on this proposition, that neither of us who have been taking the burden of this responsibility here is opposed to any of these programs.

Mr. CARLSON. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Why cannot these astute gentlemen on the majority side come in tomorrow with an amendment that will clarify this situation? Let us take care of it and see to it that nobody in this country can employ an entirely foreign outfit. That is liable to involve us in any-

You cannot tell what they will do. What is the use of putting our liberties and lives and the safety of our Republic in the hands of somebody we do not know a thing about and somebody that does not owe us any allegiance whatever.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this proposal was thoroughly and completely threshed out in committee. This is a rather poor time to be again dragging this matter out when in the maze of all the discussions of the past many of the members of the committee are somewhat handicapped to give the proper kind of reply to statements made at this time, but I will say to the gentleman that insofar as this provision is concerned, the committee has considered the matter very thoroughly, and it was decided that the American merchant marine and the American worker and the American businessman in the merchant marine business would suffer a handicap if this provision were

Now, I think some of us along the Great Lakes and along the seacoast are interested in the seamen and we are interested in shipowners, and I do not believe we are trying to sell these people "down the river."

It is not necessary that someone from Kansas or Oklahoma protect the maritime interests of this country.

This matter has been thoroughly and completely threshed out, and so far as I am concerned it is a closed matter. I am ready to vote on it right now without taking any chances with my people back home.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. DINGELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BUCK. I may say that the ranking majority member of the Merchant Marine Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Sirovich], has just endorsed the bill as the committee reported it, and I want to call the attention of my Republican friends to the fact that yesterday one of the ranking minority members, Mr. Culkin, in interrogating me said:

May I say that I concur heartily in the gentleman's conclusions and statements? I know of nothing that will stabilize the offshore marine industry to a greater extent than their placement under social security. I think the gentleman's committee has done a splendid job in this particular and I agree with the gentleman's reasoning in full.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] is the ranking Republican member on the Merchant Marine Committee next to the gentleman from California [Mr. Welch], and I may say that this is not a partisan proposition. It is a question of trying to build up and make secure our workmen who are in the maritime industry.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DINGELL. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON | places himself in a rather embarrassing position. If his amendment is agreed to and this paragraph is stricken out, it means that an American or a resident of the United States can obtain, through negotiations or otherwise, a foreign vessel and not pay the pay-roll tax. That foreign vessel is under his control and that is permissible by maritime law.

This is a condition we have to meet with ways and means. because that vessel is competing with American vessels, vessels owned by Americans and manned by Americans, and competing for the transportation of goods, and yet we are giving that man, a resident of the United States, a competitive advantage over other Americans, and this provision, of necessity, is aimed at meeting that situation.

I have no controversy with my friend about what he has in mind, but that condition must be met by other legislation. We are confronted with a condition and in order to meet that condition so that one will not be given an advantage over another, we have to draft this particular paragraph, and the elimination of the paragraph would work to the disadvantage of the Americans who are subject to the law.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Carlson) there were—ayes 39, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum in view of the fact we have only 89 Members voting, and I make the point of order there is not a quorum

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota makes the point of order there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, many proposals have been put forward here today to increase Federal contributions on considerations and arguments that appeal strongly to the heartthe more rapid amelioration of the condition of the aged by making it possible for them to receive more in the way of old-age assistance under State plans than they are now getting.

But the philosophy of such proposals goes beyond its bare objective. While the direct and immediate effect would only be to force a greater contribution by the Federal Government for every dollar paid out by the States for the assistance of the aged, we would be inaugurating a marked departure in the policy we have been following in grants-in-aid to the States, covering not only social-security items but a vast number of other subjects.

The field of Federal subsidies to the States is ever enlarging. The 50-50 matching principle, while admittedly without any scientific basis, nevertheless operates on those things which at least up to the present time are conceded to be responsibilities and duties and subjects of State government. It has been applied generally to those adventures in Federal aid to the States which seem to be persuaded as worth while and wholesome cooperative steps. That in the main is the theory although in its application there are great shortcomings and evils which I hope some day will be corrected as part of a study that will be given to the whole policy of the Federal grant-in-aid system and its results.

These aids to the States, until the advent of the Social Security Act, have generally not covered social objectives with the exception of such items as maternity and infancy care, and social-hygiene extension. Their cost, with the exception of the highway construction program, has not been great in comparison with the sort of appropriation figures to which we have now become accustomed. In the main, these grants-in-aid items have been limited to such things as building forest trails, highway construction, vocational and rehabilitation work, employment services, agricultural-extension work, and so forth. In general they have not been directed to the redressing of social conditions.

But with the advent of the Social Security Act the field of Federal grants-in-aid has become greatly broadened, and these programs now run into the hundreds of millions of

In enlarging the Federal-aid field, however, we have straight along insisted that the States match furrow with furrow; that for every dollar contributed by the Federal Treasury a dollar be contributed by the treasury of the State.

The proposals to increase the Federal contribution would scuttle that principle. It would force farther open the door of Federal participation until we reach the day when the Federal Treasury would be assuming the entire expense for assistance to the aged and where the States would not be paying a dime for the care and support of the aged in their own borders.

This amendment is urged on the plea of poverty of the States. We are told that they are unable to give the aged peoples within their borders more than they are now giving and that therefore the Federal Government must come to their rescue. They are holding out the tin cup.

But it is not alone the destruction of the 50-50 matching principle in the case of old-age assistance that is involved. If we adopt the principle in this instance, it will not be long before we shall be asked, also in the name of poverty of the States, to apply it to every other instance of existing and future grant-in-aid policy. Establish a precedent, give it some age, and you establish wisdom!

If we adopt any matching principle other than the present 50-50 plan, where will we finally land? Surely we can confidently expect that it will be applied to vocational and rehabilitation grants-in-aid; that it will be applied to highway construction, that the greater Federal contribution will be given to our cooperative programs touching all of the subjects now on the 50-50 matching basis.

I admit that the States alone are not to blame for the rapid extension of the grants-in-aid policy.

Much of the stimulus for it has been supplied by the National Government, particularly in the last 7 years. Whether done under the guise of national emergency or whether we like to admit or not, the process has been one of steady nationalization of local governmental functions, of control by Washington. Wherever the Federal dollar has gone there has been attached to it a promissory note for the States to sign, that in consideration of that dollar they will do as they are told

In those cases of national stimulus of the policy, in the extension of the bribe dollar to the States, the latter have shown little reluctance in resisting the imposition of the Federal controls that accompanied it. They have eagerly reached out for more and more and discounted the evils that would

We are pauperizing the States, pauperizing their sovereignties, through the bribe of the Federal matching dollar. For the gold they can get seemingly many are willing to barter their rights and to submit meekly to the dictation of an evergrowing bureaucracy in Washington. The Federal matching dollar has tickled their palates and they are coming back for more and more.

With respect to the general subject before us, of assistance to the aged, I am in favor of a $20 contribution by the Federal Government but only on the condition that the States match dollar for dollar. If we are to get in time a maximum of $40 monthly for old-age assistance we will only get it by the insistence that the States match the Federal contribution dollar for dollar.

As I view this proposition, the adoption of any other matching principle would mark the beginning of a break-down all along the line of the present 50-50 principle. It is vital that this tendency be resisted, in view not only of the cooperative arrangements now on the statute books but of the costly schemes that have been presented to the Congress touching the public education and national public health programs, which would commit the Federal Government, on a cooperative basis, to the expenditure of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars.

If we do not resist further encroachments on the Treasury under the matching provisions, the bureaucracy of Washington will absorb not only State duties and responsibilities but the sovereignty of the States will be ravished and we shall be contributing to the complete break-down of our present Federal system.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III—AMENDMENTS TO TITLE III OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT SEC. 301. Section 302 (a) of such act is amended to read as follows:

(a) Clause (5) of section 402 (a) of such act is amended to read as follows: "(5) provide such methods of administration (other than those relating to selection, tenure of office, and compensation of personnel) as are found by the Board to be necessary for the proper and efficient operation of the plan." (b) Effective July 1, 1941, section 402 (a) of such act is further amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a semicolon and the following new clauses: "(7) provide that the State agency shall, in determining need, take into consideration any other income and resources of any child claiming aid to dependent children; and (8) provide safeguards which restrict the use or disclosure of information concerning applicants and recipients to purposes directly connected with the administration of aid to dependent children."

Sec. 402. (a) Effective January 1, 1940, subsection (a) of section 403 of such act is amended by striking out "one-third" and inserting in lieu thereof "one-half", and paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of such section is amended by striking out "two-thirds" and inserting in lieu thereof "one-half,"

SEC. 403. Section 406 (a) of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The term 'dependent child' means a needy child under the age of 16, or under the age of 18 if found by the State agency to be regularly attending school, who has been deprived of parental support or care by reason of the death, continued absence from the home, or physical or mental incapacity of a parent, and who is living with his father, mother, grandfather, grand-mother, brother, sister, stepfather, stepmother, stepbrother, step-sister, uncle, or aunt, in a place of residence maintained by one or more of such relatives as his or their own home;".

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. RAYBURN having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 6635, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for half a minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, the National Youth Administration is giving part-time work to over 600,000 young people at a yearly cost per young person helped of $125. This is one of the finest things that the Government is doing. Everybody knows that there are young people in every community who are living day after day in idleness because they cannot find work. This is neither good for these young people nor for the Nation.

When the National Government established the National Youth Administration it took one of the wisest steps it has taken in this whole depression period, and the work which this agency has been able to perform has more than proved the wisdom of Congress in establishing it.

This year the President has asked for $125,000,000 for the National Youth Administration and the Budget Bureau has sent that amount to the Congress as the Budget estimate. Rumor has it that there is a disposition in certain circles to reduce this amount to $81,000,000. If this is true, it is one of the most unfortunate things that has happened this year, for with this relatively small sum of money-$125,000,000-I am informed that they will be able to give work to over a million young people. I think Congress should take into consideration the very great amount of good which this comparatively small sum of money will be able to accomplish. Under this arrangement it is possible for $125 to take a youth off of the streets and place him in profitable employment, where he is given experience and training which will later make it possible for him to enter private industry. I should like to call to the attention of the Members of Congress the fact that the National Youth Administration, through its programs, has placed well over a quarter of a million young people in private employment.

Not only is this work good, and efficiently and economically run but it is extremely popular in every section of the country. I do not know of anything that the Federal Government is doing that is more popular than the work of the National Youth Administration, and it is unthinkable that Congress would cut the Budget estimate which has been submitted to it. Before the Members of Congress vote to do this, I think it would be well for them to read carefully the following record of employment of young people in their respective States, which I am attaching to this statement. I have also asked for a record of the school and project employment of the National Youth Administration by counties, which it is my intention to place in the RECORD prior to the vote upon this
